With a few simple axioms of this nature the flat of a small and rather weak palm and a quite-terrible-to-be-contemplated-knowledge of the credulousness of human nature, Miss Lulu Hurst played on her unsuspecting public for two years. She stoutly avers that she thought this was a remarkable "power" of hers, and that it was peculiar to herself; but from the accounts of her various tests and experiments the melancholy fact appears that most of the exhibition was obtained from the struggling, squirming, deluded victims, and that Miss Hurst herself was untired and laughing in her sleeve at the pranks she provoked.

Pictures accompany the text of Miss Hurst's book. They represent men writhing in muscular agony, their knees quivering with force, their arms swollen with muscular energy, their feet planted firmly, trying to move a billiard cue or a chair, while a lithe and slender girl stands smiling and unwrung opposing all their contortions by a simple open palm. She reduces her own system to formula, and the pictures are marked with letters showing the leverage points.

"The heavy weight lifting test," that feat which fairly staggered multitudes and which consisted of lifting six or seven hundred pounds' weight of men off the floor in a chair by placing the palms of her hands against the chair back, Miss Hurst explains in an interesting and able manner.

When the feat was tested by scientists in Professor Bell's laboratory at Washington, Miss Hurst was weighed and then the pea was put up to 200 pounds. "I then stood on the scales," she goes on, "and lifted a chair containing a man weighing 200 pounds, without increasing my weight the twenty-pound margin given." The question was, since nearly 200 pounds of weight was apparently annihilated and not even the twenty-pound margin given her to lift in appeared on the scale figures, what became of the weight when she lifted it? No one ever gave the answer, but the lady now announces herself as prepared to do so—and does it.

A man sits in a chair and places his feet firmly on the floor at two points marked A and B in the illustration. He grasps the sides of the chair at two points marked each D, and tilts the chair so as to throw all his weight on the rear legs at points marked G and H. As everybody thought the "power" was electric or magnetic, it was thought necessary for the man in the chair to keep his feet firmly on A and B, so as to produce and sustain the "electric current."

A second man sat on the lap of the first man and this newcomer's feet were very remarkable specimen that is now in the United States National Museum, says The Washington Post. This strange aerolite is four feet in diameter, weighing 1100 pounds approximately, and has the shape of a ring. It was found in the Santa Catarina Mountains, and for a long time was used as an anvil by Mexicans at Tucson. In this employment it was discovered by Dr. Irwin, of the United States Army, who bought it for a small sum, and gave it to the Smithsonian Institution. Doubtless the substance of this meteorite originally was largely stony, but the stony parts became disintegrated and disappeared after it fell, leaving the ring of iron. Of 400 meteors that have been seen actually to fall, only about a dozen were metallic, the rest being mainly of stony material, though containing more or less iron.

On the other hand, nearly all of the meteorites picked up in a casual way are masses of metal. It is probably the case that a great majority of such bodies are stony, but meteorites of that description do not attract notice when lying on the ground, being mistaken for ordinary stones. All of these facts are extremely interesting in view of the belief now entertained by science that the composition of meteorites throws light upon the make-up of the terrestrial globe. In fact, according to this theory, the make-up of the earth is much like that of the average meteorite. Obviously, the moment this assumption is made, the study of the structure of meteorites comes to have extraordinary importance; for man's knowledge of the planet on which he lives is restricted almost entirely to the surface of it. The bowels of the earth remain almost unknown.

Meeting the Occasion.

It was the practice of a certain London editor, some years ago, to write his leading article or articles at home the night before publication. The rest of the week he did nothing. One night his articles had not come to hand at the office. Ten o'clock—11—12—and still no sign of an article. There was commotion at the office, and at last a messenger was sent to the editor's house. He found him with a glass of brandy and water before him, and newspapers scattered about. "What do you want?" asked the editor. "The article for to-morrow." "Didn't I send it?" "No; at least it has not come to the office." "Give me The Times." The Times was found and handed to him, and with unsteady fingers he cut out one of the leading articles. This he stuck upon a sheet of paper, and then, taking his pen, wrote at the top: "What does The Times mean by this?" In that form and with that introduction it appeared next morning as the editor's leading article.—London Crypt.

Through and Through.

He was awfully bored.

The day was a bright and sunshiny one, and all outdoors had taken on its gayest aspect, but he did not even rise from the ground, which, in spite of the warmth, was still damp from the early dews.

He lay on his back on the wet grass and gazed straight up into the sky without moving.

Every now and then he gave vent to a deep sigh, but beyond that, and an occasional hoarse noise from his throat, he showed no signs of existence.

He felt so terribly bored.

Most people would have thought that he had plenty to live for, as he was rich in worldly goods, and with a young wife and child, there seemed every prospect of his being able to at least get along.

Indeed, he would have liked to do so, very much, but he was so very bored.

Some amateur sportsman in the woods had mistaken him for a bear, and had sent buckshot through his body.

He was waiting for a surgeon.

A Good Company.

The Burtch Jubilee Theatrical Company which has been playing in town during the past week, is certainly deserving of much better patronage than they have been receiving. People seem to be laboring under the impression that the company is not any good, but in this they are mistaken we are glad to say. We cannot make personal reference to each member of the troop, but suffice to say they are nearly all direct from New York. Two new specialists arrived on Wednesday, and with the addition of Mr. Booth, who is well known in town, the company will be greatly strengthened. The little dancer is good and is no novice on the stage.

Should keep themselves healthy and especial care should be given to this matter at this time. Health depends upon pure, rich blood, for when the blood is impure and impoverished diseases of various kinds are almost certain to result. The one true blood purifier is Hood's Sarsaparilla. By its power to purify and vitalize health, and the record of remarkable cures effected proves that it has wonderful power over disease. It actually and permanently cures when all other preparations fail to do any good whatever.

Nuptuals.

The following is from the Colborne Enterprise. The bride is well and favorably known in this section: A very quiet home wedding was that of Mr. Allen Kidd, of Warsaw and Miss Mattie Robeson, daughter of Rev. J. E. Robeson, Colborne, which took placed on Thursday last at two o'clock, at the residence of the bride's parents. Only the immediate relatives of the parties and a few intimate friends of the bride were present. The ceremony was performed by the father of the bride assisted by Rev. T. W. Jolliffe. Mr. and Mrs. Kidd left on the evening train for Belleville and other places.

Tampering with a Mill-Dam.

A very interesting case was tried before Mr. J. D. Walker, J. P., at the Court House, Monday morning. Two men, Richard and Wilson Walker, of the township of Hinchinbrook, were charged with destroying a mill dam at Fifty Depot Lake, in the township of Hinchinbrook. Mr. B. S. O'Loughlin and W. J. Benjamin, representing the Napanee River Improvement Co., came in from Yarker this morning to look after their company's interests in prosecuting the defendants. The members of the company claim that the dams are frequently tampered with. Sometimes fisherman open the sluice to allow the fish to pass through; at other times people open the dam to keep the water from flooding their lands. Only the other day one of the dams in the back country was blown up by dynamite. To tamper with the sluices is a serious offence and, if the parties are convicted, means a long term of imprisonment in the Provincial Penitentiary. The case was dismissed for lack of evidence, but the company are determined to put a stop to tampering with their property.—Kingston News.

The Town Censor.

Our esteemed contemporary the Star devoted about one column and a half of its valuable space to THE EXPRESS last week. Our neighbor, apparently, was not pleased with our mild protest against its highly colored picture of the town, and proceeds to pour the vials of its wrath upon our devoted head. Perhaps the abuse heaped upon us by this self-appointed censor was deserved for our temerity in venturing to deprecate assertion that Napanee is a place where lewd women hold high carnival and "by day and night delight to flaunt their vice in the faces of the public." Of course the Star very generously affords us a loophole of escape by hinting that perhaps our article was not seriously intended. In fact that journal can't conceive it possible that anyone should differ with it on the subject, although more than half our citizens resent the undeserved odium cast upon the fair fame of our fair town by the Star's exaggerated, far fetched and highly sensational article. Unlike the Star we do not look upon Napanee as a dangerous place in which to bring up a family. The moral tone of the town is above the average and as regards churches and educational institutions Napanee is very highly privileged. It is not our intention to notice the Star's coarse attack upon ourselves or in fact to pursue the subject any further. If imputing sinster motives and abusing a confrere is a sample of its idea of journalistic common sense and etiquette we are glad that we fall short.

Edward Reindeer a Mexican negro was arrested in Deseronto Wednesday morning on a charge of burglary. He was confined in Deseronto jail just long enough to be able to see his way out and when he did he lost no time in leaving the premises. He ran like a reindeer and soon lost his pursuers. He went west and Chief Newton, Belleville, was told to be on the lookout for him. In the evening he was seen at Marysville but darkness of course lent him a helping hand and he hasn't been seen since.

A Valuable Discovery.

Several weeks ago there was cabled from London the news of the wonderful discoveries made in January last on the borders of the Libyan Desert, of the oldest papyri known bearing the words of Christ. The value of this find in the interest it will arouse the whole Christian world proves inestimable. It comprises a dozen leaves, each 5½ by 3½ inches in size, remarkably well preserved, and clearly written in unicil characters of the ancient Greek. It dates about sixty years after the crucifixion. It has easily been translated, and is found to consist of detached sayings of Christ, without context, each beginning with words, "Jesus saith." The translation will soon be published by the Egypt Exploration Fund. An immense edition at a few pence per copy will be provided, as as to reach everybody. Prof. Petrie's winter explorations in Egypt have also been wonderfully fruitful. The bulk of his collections is in two groups, separated by a gap of more than thirty centuries. The papyri comprise 4,000 documents. The contents of this library probably range from the first to the sixth century. The discoverer expects that ten to twenty years will be occupied before the papyri are fully deciphered.

The Outcome of a Quarrel.

On Sunday last Reuben Jackson, proprietor of the Jackson House, Verona, accompanied by Matthew Sevell, of that place went for a drive. Jackson has been ailing for many years, and has been growing weaker all the time. Besides consumption his heart is also affected. Previous to the drive on Sunday he had been drinking pretty freely, his continued illness making him despondent.

He wanted to go to Enterprise and Yarker on Sunday, and this was the reason he asked and persuaded Revell to accompany him. Jackson is of a very irritable nature, especially when in drink. The story goes that Jackson wanted to get Revell drunk. After both had imbibed pretty freely Jackson became quarrelsome and Revell warned him to let him alone. The upshot of it was that the rig was upset and the men thrown into the road. Jackson made a rush at Reyell, striking him a couple of times. Revell retaliated, and it is quite evident that it did not require much to knock Jackson out. It is altogether likely that when he fell he struck his head and also hurt his back. As soon as Reyell had struck the unfortunate man he saw that he had made a mistake and immediately got him into the rig and drove for Verona. The row occured about a mile outside of Verona. Revell stopped at S. Asselstine's hotel on his way in and Asselstine immediately advised him to take Jackson to the doctor's, as all their efforts to revive him were of no avail. His condition is still very serious, and Dr. Moles has very little hope for his recovery. It is not thought that Jackson received very severe treatment at the hands of Revell. The latter was, of course, excited, or probably he would never have struck Jackson, although he provoked him. It is not felt that Jackson's present condition is caused by the fracas, as there is little doubt that he would have been laid up after the drunk. The authorities have done nothing to Revell as yet.

was scheduled for Saturday, and Deseronto was asked if it was intended to come down on Friday or Saturday. The reply was very brief. "Neither" was all the telegram contained. It is presumed the members are huffed over the decision of the referee in the last Napanee-Deseronto match. It might be added that the referee on that occasion knows the rules of association football perhaps better than any other player in Canada, and he has been playing the game all his lifetime. So long as everything went swimmingly in favor of Deseronto the members of that team wore broad smiles, but when by skilful playing another team proved itself just a little better, the players from the Mohawk reservation became indignant. They proved themselves void of sporting principles in insisting upon claiming a goal kicked from a glaring off-side. The Kingston team had the best grounds in the world for a protest in its meeting with the Deseronto team, but for the sake of harmony and peace allowed the matter to go, thus giving Deseronto two points not earned nor deserved. In return for all this the pettish Deserontoites get on their high horse and, like the child in the song say, "I don't want to play in your yard." The Kingston team has submitted an offer to go to Deseronto once more to finish the schedule. As matters now stand the Kingston club wins the cup with twelve points. Sydenham is next with eleven.

OBITUARY.

MRS. S. R. MILLER.

On Saturday morning a feeling of sadness was cast over the community when the sad intelligence of the death of Mrs. S. R. Miller was made known. For the past two years Mrs. Miller has suffered from an illness, which baffled medical skill. She was not constantly afflicted, for at times was apparently in the best of health. Last winter she was taken with an attack and never fully recovered although for a few weeks she was up and around. About a month ago deceased was taken with a third attack and kept gradually sinking, until Saturday morning when she was called home to meet those who had gone before. Mrs. Miller was in her forty-seventh year and was always a resident of Napanee. Her maiden name was Alice J. Dryden, the only daughterof the late Wm. Dryden, who at one time was a partner in the grocery business in this town with Mr. Miller. Mrs. Miller was a consistent christian and a member of the Eastern Methodist church. Her life was an exemplary one and her illness was borne with christian patience and courage. Besides a loving and devoted husband, there are two sons and two daughters left to mourn the loss they have sustained. We feel that any words of ours would be of litttle consolation to the sorrowing family at this time, but we join with others in expressions of sympathy at the sad bereavement which has fallen upon them. The funeral took place on Sunday afternoon at four o'clock, to the Eastern cemetery and was largely attended. The A. O. U. W. of which Mr. Miller is Master Workman attended in a body.

CARRIE M'COY.

On Sunday morning last after a lingering illness the spirit of Miss Carrie McCoy, a bright and promising girl who was loved by all with whom she was acquainted, passed away to join the countless throng on the other shore. Carrie was the only daughter of Mrs. Wm. McCoy and granddaughter of Mr. James Fellows with whom she lived. She was in her fourteenth year. Last winter she contracted a cold, which settled upon her lungs and developed into consumption. Notwithstanding the best of care and medical skill she kept gradually sinking and on Sunday last she was called to eternal rest. Deceased was a member of the Eastern Methodist Sabbath School, and was a believer in Christ, whom she steadfastly endeavored to serve. The funeral took place on Tuesday afternoon last to the Eastern Cemetery, and was largely attended by sorrowing friends. We extend our heartfelt sympathy to the sorrowing mother and brother, in their sad bereavement.

NORMAN STORMS.

It is with feelings of deepest regret that we are called upon to record the death of Norman Storms Esq., which sad event occurred at Violet on Saturday last. We have not received any particulars regarding his illness. Deceased was universally and highly respected, and his decease is deeply regretted. Mr. Storms was a staunch Reformer and could always be relied upon when work was to be done. He was an energetic worker in the cause of Methodism. The funeral which took place on Monday was largely attended. The bereaved family and relatives have our sincere successful result of her recent examinations at the Toronto Conservatory of Music. She passed with honors on organ playing. This examination was on third year work. She has only been attending the institution for about eight months, and the result is a most satisfactory showing as she stood next to the lady who took the diploma and gold medal.

Reform Convention.

On Thursday last a meeting of the Reform Association was held in the town hall for the purpose of selecting a candidate for the riding of Lennox at the coming elections to the Ontario Legislature. Mr. Symington, president, was in the chair. Bowen E. Aylsworth, warden of the county was unaminously selected. Speeches were delivered by D. W. Allison and G. W. Dawson. A full report of the meeting will appear in our next issue.

A Fatal Accident.

A shocking accident occurred on Wednesday in the Grand Trunk yards, Belleville in which William Hose, of Deseronto, was cut in two by a train. It appears that the unfortunate young man, with two companions, boarded a freight train going east and, as the conductor ordered them off, Hose jumped off in front of the afternoon express for the west, which then came along. The express engine struck him and knocked him under the freight, which passed over him, completely severing his body. The trains were stopped and willing hands speedily went to the injured man's aid, but he appeared to have been instantly killed.

Killed at Watertown.

Edward McPherson, a steam engineer employed at the Remington Paper Co's mill B on Sewell's Island, Watertown, was caught in a large driving belt shortly before 9 o'clock Saturday morning and received injuries from which he died about an hour later. At first it was supposed that he had been killed as the result of an accident while at work, but later development reveal even more unfortunate circumstance and places the responsibility for his death at least partly on John McMillan, a fellow workman, who exchanged blows with McPherson, as a result of which the latter fell upon the machinery and was killed. Our informant states that the deceased formerly lived at Camden East. He has been in the employ of the Remington Paper Company for the past ten years.

An Express Robbery.

The mysterious disappearance of a $250 sealskin sacque from one of the waggons of the Canadian Express Co. is excercising the detective department of Toronto. While the Buffalo Bill Wild West Show was at Quebec one of the ladies of the troupe ordered a magnificient sealskin coat. It was arranged that the coat should be made in Quebec and forwarded to the Toronto branch of the firm, tried on there, and paid for. On Saturday the coat reached Toronto by the Canadian Express Co. and was sent out in one of the regular delivery waggons. The driver last saw the parcel at the Pure Gold Works on Front street, where he delivered a package. From there to Renfrew's store on King street is not five minutes' distance, but when he looked for the parcel at Renfrew's it was not in his waggon. It must have been removed from the wagon either while he was in the Pure Gold Company's building or on the street between there and Renfrew's.

The electric light is being put into the park for Thursday's Grand Fete.

A very sociable and enjoyable evening was spent at the residence of R. Vance, 7 Hamilton street, Watertown, on Monday evening of last week, it being the birthday of his daughter Hattie. About 50 of her friends and relatives were present and enjoyed themselves dancing and playing pedro and other games. Ice cream and cake were served. Excellent music was rendered during the evening, and the lawn was beautifully decorated for the occasion. The party disbursed about midnight.

ing a change in the Ontario License Act, and in the item made reference to the Odessa hotelkeepers. Mr. Robt. Bennett, of Odessa, sends the following:

Odessa, Ont., July 4th, 1897.

Editor Napanee Express.

DEAR SIR—I see in your last week's issue an item referring to Odessa hotelkeepers finding fault with Napanee hotelkeepers, wanting them to comply with the law, as Odessa hotelkeepers have. I Robt. Bennett, hotelkeeper, of the village of Odessa, never intimated anything of the kind and I wish my Napanee friends to know so. The people of Napanee want what the Odessa people want, that is their business, not mine, or the people living in this vicinity. I wish to have this published as you said hotelkeepers (that means two) and I am not in it. Yours truly,

ROBT. BENNETT,

Sir Wilfred Laurier, the dominion premier, addressing a meeeting of members of the house of commons, known as the colonial party, urged the direct representation of the colonies in the imperial parliament, which ought to be, he contended, a grand national council or imperial federal parliament. AN INTERESTING CHAPTER OF THEIR SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

What Some Royal Women Are Engaged In—Marriage of Royalties—The Business Woman's Home-Coming—All Is Not Gold That Glitters.

"One of the things that has hurt me more than anything else in going away from home," says the girl who started out in the world to make her own way, "was when I went back after some time and found that I was no longer a necessity there. Every one was as glad to see me as possible and affectionate in every way, but I found that I had gradually drifted out of the family life—I was an outsider. They made their plans and lived their lives without me. They did not need me in any way. My outside life has been pleasant; I have done what I intended to do, and my relations with my family are pleasant in every way, but I shall never forget entirely, I think, that little hurt feeling, that feeling of lonesomeness, when I first found that I was an outsider."

A Jacobite Wedding.

British Jacobites celebrated the marriage of the Princess Maria Theresa of Bavaria and Prince Ferdinand Pius de Bourbon by a banquet on White Rose Day, June 10. The Princess is, after her elder sister, the direct representative of the Stuart line, and the Prince of Calabria is the son of the former King of Naples, whose portrait was drawn by M. Alphonse Daudet as the King of Illyria in his "Roi en Exile." The royal wedding took place on June 8, and, besides the banquet already mentioned, another was given in honor of the occasion on the day of the ceremony by the Order of St. Germain, founded by the Old Pretender.

Princess Maria Theresa.

Prince Ferdinand is a very young man, having been born at Rome on July 25, 1869. He bears the title of Duke of Calabria. Princess Maria Theresa of Bavaria, second daughter of Prince Louis, and granddaughter of the Regent Luitpold, was born in 1872. Prince Ferdinand of Bourbon is a nephew of the late King of the Two Sicilies, the famous "Bomba." His father is the Comte de Caserta, but he bears the title provisionally and without abandoning his claims to the kingdoms of the Two Sicilies and Jerusalem, one of which his elder brother enjoyed, while the other has long been only a pious aspiration.

Triumphs of Domestic Science

One thing that is almost as important as a knowledge of cooking, and fully as important when there are good servants to do the cooking, is a delicate taste. It takes a well-bred taste to know if the viands are cooked to the proper turn, the eggs absolutely fresh, the cream what it should be, and the salad dressing properly mixed. This is a less common possession than people think. A woman who has made a great success as a cook attributes it largely to her knowledge of how things should taste. The woman who takes up domestic science for a profession takes up a business which not only gives her plenty of scope for brain work, but is very hard on her physically. Where she does the practical work, the cooking, she is apt to break down, even while she is studying, if she is not strong. The effect of the heat and standing constantly on the feet is more than most women can stand.

Food and Beauty.

The woman who intends to have a good complexion must make a careful study of the food question. It goes without saying that sugary substances must be banished from the bill of fare. Candies are, of course, excluded. Cakes follow in their wake. As for pies and all other compounds of flour and grease, they are fatal to clear skins. Bread that is doughy or starchy ranks almost as low as pastry in the estimation of the seeker after good looks.

Alcoholic drinks are banished almost entirely; their effect, even in small quantities, being a mild form of congestion of blood in the face, which eventually coarsens the texture as well as ruins the color of the skin. For somewhat similar reasons all sorts of narcotics and stimulants are to be avoided. Whatever excites the nerves or overheats the blood smooth, peachy texture which is the chief of every woman's ambition to attain.

Whatever has the effect of producing a healthy action of the digestive organs is good for the complexion. Acid and laxative fruits especially, if taken at breakfast, are good. Graham bread and toast rank high among the bread beautifiers. Red and juicy meats, green vegetables, milk and eggs, are all conducive to the attaining of a brilliant complexion.

The Princess Helene.

Helene, Princess of Naples, has been photographed by one of her new subjects in Italy, and the fresh picture shows her to be a very beautiful young woman. Almost everyone has read of her adventures as the Princess of Montenegro and her remarkable out-of-door life in the Black Mountains. Helene will not soon grow adapted to the cabined environment she will be compelled to live in as the wife of the Crown Prince of Italy. Her girlhood was spent in the mountains, out in the open air, in the saddle, climbing peaks for better views and even in hunting. She is an excellent horsewoman, a rare shot, and the exuberance of her spirits and brilliancy of eye are entirely due to the hygiene of her life up to date. The Princess does not speak Italian, but she is hard at work learning the language. Her family name is Petrovitsch-Njegusch, and her great ancestor, Danilo, was made "Lord of the Black Mountains" in 1696. Hers is a family of fighters.

Wife of the Crown Prince of Italy.

What Would He Do?

There is a young Southern woman in New York, who, when she speaks of her early girlhood in the South, says The New York Times, smiles a little at what is evidently an amusing reminiscence.

"I will tell you what it is," she said to a friend, who asked the cause of her smile. "It was when I was very young that I had a very persistent lover, a man quite a little older than I. Well, finally, after much persistence on his part and persistent snubbing on mine, he asked me to marry him—by letter. It was a warm epistle, and at the close of it he wrote: 'Send me at any time only one word—tell me only to come, and wherever you art I will fly to you.' That was some little time ago, and in the meantime my former lover has recovered from his misplaced affection, but he is still unmarried. In looking back, those old days seem so far off, and I smile to myself and wonder what would happen and how that poor man would feel if I should send him the 'come' he so much wished at this late day. What would he do, do you suppose?"

MAN!

Man!
Whoever heard of him!
Where lies his glory dim-
What's he
To bow the knee
To? Man!

Where
Are his 'chievements great?
Why doth he rule the State?
How now!
Why bow
To man?

Man!
What a poor thing!
To him pity bring!
Why he Can't even be Without woman!
—Lin O. Type, in Woman's Edition Bangor Commercial.

Women as Letter Carriers.

A small number of women have served as letter carriers in England for many years, and they give general satisfaction. Only a few months ago a noted old postwoman died at Cutskye, some ten miles from Leeds. From the Queen's accession in 1837 till 1869 she was the letter-carrier in the ancient town of Pontefract and was never known to be absent from her duties from sickness during the 32 years. Monckton Milnes, first Lord Houghton, took an interest in her career, and was instrumental in obtaining a government pension for her in her declining years.

May Be Belgium's Queen

The engagement has been announced of Princess Clementine, the third daughter of King Leopold of Belgium, to Prince Albert, son of Count Philippe of Flanders. Prince Albert is the only son of Comte de Flandre, brother of the King. King Leopold lost his only son some years ago, and since the death of his elder brother, Prince Baldwin, in 1891, Prince Albert has been after his father's heir presumptive to the Belgian throne. He is now in his 22nd year.

It was thought at one time that he was betrothed to the Princess Isabel, third sister of the Duc d'Orleans. Princess Clementine was born on July 30, 1872, and has two elder sisters. One, born in 1858, is married to Prince Philip of Saxe-Coburg; the other, who is eight years older than is the widowed Crown Princess Stephanie of Austria. Their mother, Queen Marie Henriette, is the daughter of the late Archduke Joseph of Austria.

Princess Clementine of Belgium.

Princess Clementine is well educated, draws and paints, speaks German, Italian and English, and is an accomplished musician and a patron of the arts. Princess Clementine, like all the children of Belgium's king, seemed at one time fated to unhappiness, for Prince Baudouin of Flanders, to whom she was to have been officially betrothed, died a few days before the declaration could be made. Should Prince Albert die before King Leopold the Belgian throne will escape her.

'The Cake of Scented Soap."

"If you are about to inculcate, or endeavor to inculcate, ideas of cleanliness in the people among whom your missionary work is done," says Missionary Miss E. Marguerite Lindley, "be sure that you take with you scented soaps. A cake of scented soap will work miracles. It will institute a series of baths whea months of talk would be unavailing."

Crown Princess of Sweden and Norway.

Princess Victoria, the Crown Princess of Sweden, has taken up the wheel. Cycling has not been a favorite pastime among the royalties of Europe since the German Empress frowned upon it of late. It is said that William, too, does not care to see the women of the Imperial family astride the wheel. In the face of all this, however, the Swedish Crown Princess has taken up the exercise, it is said, at the advice of her physicians. The Princess is an invalid, and for many years has been unable to attend to the education of her children, which has devolved upon Queen Sophia. She spends most of her time in Southern Italy and the south of France, and the continued illness of his wife is said to have cast a gloom upon the spirit of the heir apparent to the throne of Sweden and Norway. Princess Victoria is 38 years old. She is the daughter of the Grand Duke of Baden, and was married to Gustaf in 1881. She has borne three children, all of them being sons.

Princess Victoria.

The Princess of Wales' Preference.

The Princess of Wales has no great fondness for diamonds, and rarely wears them, except at state entertainments. She is fond of pearls, sapphires and opals, the uncanny qualities popularly associated with the latter not appealing to her in the smallest degree. For the ruby, too, she has somewhat of an affection, and the royal jewel cases contain some splendid specimens of that brilliant stone brought to England by the Prince when he returned from his memorable trip through India.

BINSON CO.

IN THE TWILIGHT.

My hands are growing weary,
While from my setting sun
The gold is slowly fading,
And so much work undone.

Now every passing moment
Some task unfinished brings
To hands grown weary doing
So many useless things.

My feet are also weary:
The ways they walk are hard,
The thorns have held and hurt them,
The stones have left them scarred.

Here, in the gathering twilight,
They falter now and fall,
Poor feet that stray so far from
The straight and narrow trail.

Away off in a canon
I hear a lost sheep cry,
And on the perfect pathway
See happy souls go by.

But O! My soul is weary
As wearily I plod,
And all because I've wandered
So far away from God.

STRANGE BOOKS.

Some Specimens Anthologists Have Rescued From Oblivion.

The first anthology was a collection of Greek poems, epigrams and other small pieces of Archilochus, Sappho, Somonides, Meleager, Plato and others, between 680 and 95 B.C.

In 1471 a French baron offered a pledge of 10 marks of silver that a copy of Avicenna, which he desired to read, would be returned, and even with this security, equal in our money to over $60, his request was refused.

The "Book of Common Prayer," was prepared by the command of Henry VIII. in 1546. It underwent several revisions, but the second, made in the reign of Edward VI., very nearly approaches the prayer-book as used to-day in the Church of England. The prayer for the royal family was introduced by James I.

Most of the chapters of Livy, as well as some of the entire compositions of Cicero and other ancient authors, have been recovered from the palimpsests, the original writing having been partially effacted in order that the monkish transcribers might use the parchment for their homilies.

The vast collection of the state papers of Thurloe, Cromwell's State Secretary, which make about seventy volumes, were discovered by an accident. They had been hidden in the false ceiling of a room in Lincoln's Inn. By accident the fastenings having rusted away the ceiling fell and this precious collection came to light.

The largest work on one subject is the "Acta Sanctorum," or "Deeds of the Saints," most commonly called "Lives of the Saints." It was begun by the Bollandists, a community of the Society of Jesus. The first volume was completed in 1643 and sixty-one volumes have altogether been issued. Other volumes are still in preparation.

The first ecclesiastical anthology was the "Book of Sentences," by Pierre Lombard. It was a compilation of the leading arguments of the fathers upon points of divinity, arranged and digested under heads. It is said that 244 commentators have written annotations on this book, among others Thomas Aquinas, Guillaume Durand and St. Bonaventure.

Fools and Fools.

A middle-aged woman who was riding upon a Payne-avenue grip car, yesterday morning, signaled the conductor to stop in front of the Arcade. Before the car had come to a standstill she scrambled over two seats, in order to get off on the inside. As her feet struck the ground she saw a Superior street car about five feet away and rushing on toward her.

She gave a shriek, stepped back, and was almost dragged under the car from which she had alighted. People who were watching her supposed that she would be killed, but by cool work upon the part of the gripman she escaped uninjured.

"Thunder!" exclaimed a big man upon one of the front seats of the Payne avenue grip car, "what fools some people are! They'll risk their lives just to save half a dozen steps or three seconds of time. If I could have my way I'd never let a woman go down town without sending somebody who had sense along to keep her from making a blanked fool of herself."

He kept on mumbling about it until the car had reached Seneca street, where there are four tracks, with cars running very near together upon all of them nearly all the time.

Then, without looking around to see whether the way was clear or not, he swung off, stepped in front of a Woodland avenue train, and saved himself by making one of the greatest jumps of his life when the gong of the motor was sounded about four feet from his ear.—Cleveland Leader.

Apple Tree With a History.

Mrs. Sarah Kincaid, living at Rushville, Ind., is the owner of the oldest fruit tree in the county; in fact, the oldest tree of any kind in the county planted by human hand of which there is record. The apple is a greening, and is a seedling. It was planted in 1817 by some of the ancestors of Mrs. Kincaid. They were passing through this section from Kentucky and camped on this spot. The tree is now 80 years old. It is now almost 10 feet in circumference at the base and is over 50 feet high. It shades sufficient ground in summertime for a colored campmeeting. The tree has never once failed to bear a crop of apples since it first bore fruit. In the days of slavery agitation several political meetings were held in this apple grove and under this patriarchal apple tree. It is said that meetings of Knights of the Golden Circle were also held there during the war. Thomas Bright, a farm laborer, committed suicide by hanging himself to the branches of this old tree. The family intends to let the tree stand as long as nature wills it should.

Deadliest of All Guns

The British Government is now experimenting with a gun which will fire 1000 shots in 123 seconds. It is the deadliest of all the automatic man-slayers ever yet invented. As with all machine guns, the first shot must be fired by hand. After that the weapon will absorb cartridges and emit a chain of bullets as long as it is fed. Experiments made thus far show that on the occasion of a brief sharp attack, the gun can actually be made to fire eleven shots in a single second.

A very interesting feature of this new gun is that the explosive power results from the use of cordite. The whole of this substance is expended in pressure, whereas black powder is only useful for pressure to the extent of fifty per cent. The experiments with cordite and with the gun refered to show conclusively that cordite is not affected by water, as is gunpowder, and will stand great variation in temperature.

Rather Awkward.

A teacher examining his class in Bible knowledge asked:

"What did Samson slay the Philistines with?"

No answer.

Wishing to help them to remember it he tapped his jawbone with his finger, saying:

"What is this?"

Then they exclaimed with a mighty chorus:

"The jawbone of an ass."—Spare Moments.

A Scorching Remedy.

When you suspect what you are cooking has been scorched because you have neglected it for just one moment too long, lift the vessel holding the food quickly from the fire and stand it in a pan of water for a few minutes. In almost every case the scorched taste will entirely disappear.

A New Stock.

There is a new stock. It consists of a straight band of the material, which hooks at the back and develops in front in a pert, fan-like bow. These stocks are made of silk gauze or dotted lawn.

Cameron told him it was the place for him to get out, the fellow began feeling in his pocket and said he had lost some whiskey, accusing Mr. Cameron of taking it. Cameron told him that he knew nothing about it, Fingland became very abusive and used threatening language. Finally he struck at Cameron with a knife, cutting a dangerous wound near the lower part of the lung. Hopes are now entertained of his recovery. Fingland has been arrested and lodged in jail.

There has been considerable gossip of late to the effect that Sir Donald Smith, the Canadian high commissioner would resign on assuming his peerage, the two positions being incompatible. On this subject Sir Wilfrid Laurier said: "I know of no reason why a peer cannot be an agent-general, and I know of no wish or thought displeasing to the present agent-gengral."

The cause of the coal miners strike in the United States is to call into effect a scale of wages adopted at the annual convention held in 1895. Owing to the depression and demoralized state of the coal market at that time it was not enforced, but was left to the judgment of the National Executive Board. The average yearly earnings of a miner in Ohio last year amounted to $221.75, from which must be reduced $4 per month for blasting powder and pick sharpening which would make his yearly next earnings $173.75.

"Why do women have such poor hair nowadays?" asks an observing man. "When I was young, girls used to have hair they could sit on, and so thick they hardly knew what to do with it. Now few women seem to have hair to cover their heads. The partings are broad and coarse, the hair thin on the temples and behind the ears, so that it is unpleasant to look at the back of a woman's head and see the comb marks left in the scant locks. Spanish women and Creoles have splendid hair. Why can't Northern women have it?"

The briefest answer is that southern women perspire. Tropic warmth produces free passage of all the fluids of the body, throwing off all effete substance and procuring rare nourishment of every gland and fibre. Consequently we find in tropic women finely grained skins, continually dissolved, renewed and kept fresh by the delicate vapor which invests the body, and with this skin hair of marvelous length and thickness. Next to southern types the finest complexion and tints of hair are found in Irish, Scotch and German women, working in the fields, where moist atmosphere, coarse food and sunshine kindly do more for beauty than hard conditions can do against it.

Loss of hair is not merely an injury to looks, but a serious damage to the general comfort of the body. The locks are a necessary protection to the skull and scalp, and assist in equalizing the temperature of the brain, blood and entire system. Thin hair prepares the way for neuralgia of the head and face, especially with open bonnets and a windy climate. Neuralgia quickly induces grayness and affects the sight. Nature's penalties for neglect are various and interlinked. Thin haired persons often have weak eyes, but seldom connect the two conditions. The hair ought to be thick on the forehead and waved or crisp enough to afford a slight shade of the eyes, without falling so low as to interfere with the sight. The flat, well-brushed bands of hair in the front, drawn strictly away from the parting, cause thinning on the temples and at the parting.

Wrong hairdressing aggravates spinal malady as truly as weighty skirts do. The Psyche knot, so pretty for the very few who know how to wear it, probably injured the hair of Grecian women, as it does our own. If twisted tight, Psyche knot, or "massive coil," does immense mischief by heating the base of the brain and sensitive top of the spine.

Young girls should wear their hair free and curling, tied by a ribbon or light fillet, or in braids as long as decorum will tolerate, as the nature of hair is to grow under all possible conditions, and as with good care its average growth is from five to thirteen inches a year, it would be the work of a few seasons only to provide most women with as handsome a chevelure as they desire.

Thin, soft, dry hair needs tender care, but with either the step toward improvement is thorough cleansing of the scalp and hair, which collects dust its entire length. Various alkalies, borax, ammonia, bicarbonate of potash and washing soda are used for washing the head, and strong hair will bear them, but they burn the life out of thin, dry locks. Most hair washes are entirely too strong. Soap bark is really better than anything, except the shampoo powder of the "fatal sisters," which leaves the hair luxuriously silky instead of flying like thistledown. Pour two quarts of boiling water on a tablespoonful of soap bark, let it cool till pleasant, comb the hair smoothly from the face, part it and scrub down the parting with the shampoo brush, which is like an exaggerated tooth brush, wetting the skin well with the decoction. It lathers well, and the whole head should be gone over, making twenty or more partings, the hair rinsed in plenty of clean water, combed and wiped smoothly, not rubbing ferociously and tangling, which breaks it.

IN discussing the recent action of the Senate, disallowing the Intercolonial extension deal, the Globe concludes thus:

"It may be that it would be good policy for the government to appoint an independent commission, and make a thorough investigation into the whole question of railway subsidies in Canada, and the way that these subsidies have been used by their fortunate recipients during the last ten, fifteen or twenty years, and then let us resolve that once for all we have reached the end of the system of subsidizing local railways out of the Federal treasury."

In place of "it may be" we say it would be of great benefit to let the people know what has become of the millions of money granted as aid to all various railways — just how many people have been made rich—and how many have been made millionaires. Once the people of this country know what has become of the "aid" extended railway schemes and schemers, there would indeed be an end of subsidies. Let there be an investigation by all means. It would be interesting reading to learn for instance what actually became of the large sums of money given the C. P. R. and other heavily bonused railways.

MR. TARTE is just now the bad man of the Reform party, according to the Tory press. All the vials of wrath and and vituperation that used to be poured on Sir Richard Cartwright's head are now emptied upon the offending Tarte, and the reason for this is obvious. Mr. Tarte was a Tory. He is now a Reformer. He is clever, and as an organizer for a campaign cannot be equalled. Witness his achievements in Quebec. A large Conservative majority in both the Local and Federal Houses has been turned into a minority, and largely by Mr. Tarte's ability. Hence all kinds of charges are hurled at him. He is everything that is bad. But nothing

BOWEN E. AYLSWORTH

NOMINATED ON THE FIRST BALLOT.

A meeting of the reformers of Lennox took place in the town hall here on Thursday afternoon last, according to announcement. There was a good representation present.

Mr. Thos. Symington, president of the Lennox Reform Association, occupied the chair, and made a few appropriate introductory remarks on the situation, calling attention to the present favorable outlook for a victory in Lennox, and announcing that he did not intend to accept a nomination for himself but would work heartily for the choice of the convention.

Mr. D. W. Allison moved that the convention proceed to the choice of a candidate by ballot without nomination.

The motion was seconded by Mr. H. S. Davy.

Ballot papers were then prepared by the secretary, Mr. Herrington, and passed around and collected.

A count of the ballots showed Mr. B. E. Aylsworth to have a clear majority of the votes, and on motion the nomination was made unanimous.

Mr. Aylsworth amid loud cheers from all present then ascended the platform and thanked the meeting for the nomination in a few well chosen words. He did not know whether to accept the nomination just then.

Mr. H. M. Deroche said he thought Mr. Aylsworth would be making a great mistake if he did not accept such a nomination. He was no doubt the strongest man the convention could bring out, and Lennox ought to be represented in the Local House. He had a clear majority over all others upon a free ballot, and this was a favor not usually accorded a candidate.

Mr. D. W. Allison thought if Mr. Aylsworth accepted the nomination he was sure of election.

Mr. Wilson, Selby, said Mr. Aylsworth should suppress his modesty a little, and take into consideration the fact of his having a clear majority upon a first ballot, which was then made unanimous Better accept the nomination to-day and let the meeting go forth with the news that Mr. Aylsworth is the reform candidate to represent Lennox in the next assembly.

Dr. Leonard who was second on the ballot was loudly called for, and responding, the doctor said he was well satisfied that Mr. Aylsworth should be the candidate, and he would take off his coat and work for him with pleasure.

Mr. Cyrus Allison thought as Mr. Aylsworth had obtained such a decisive majority on a first ballot he should yield to the wishes of the meeting and accept nomination.

Mr. White said he would vote and pray, and with Dr. Leonard with his coat off and himself voting as he prayed Mr. Aylsworth would be swept right into the Ontario Parliament.

Several other speakers including Mr. Rouse and Mr. Herrington urged Mr. Aylsworth to accept the nomination, and promised all the aid they could render.

Mr. G. W. Dawson then addressed the meeting, chiefly directing his remarks as to the best method of organizing. Incidentally, however, Mr. Dawson alluded to Mr. Hardy, who was, he said, a veteran politician of twenty-five years experience in public life, and who had never been caught tripping.

In concluding an able address Mr. Dawson said:—Mr. Whitney says we are on the eve of direct taxation and nothing can avoid it. Therefore do not support Mr. Whitney, because Mr. Hardy sees

HER ORGAN.

By VIRGINIA N. LEEDS.

It was all on account of Miss Malvina's organ. If she hadn't had an organ it would probably never have happened. The dictionary declares that an organ such as Miss Malvina possessed is "a membraneous receptacle, the principal organ of digestion, in which food is prepared for nourishing the body."

Perhaps Miss Malvina's organ was a membraneous receptacle. There were no absolute proofs to the contrary—but that it was an organ of digestion was simply a slander. There was no digestion about it. It was indigestion all the way through. The food that went into it, if it made up its mind to remain, didn't nourish her body in the least and only subjected her to every kind of discomfort.

Taken as a whole, this organ, which for lack of corroboration we shall call a membraneous receptacle, was a barrel organ of indigestion in which nothing except torture was prepared for either body or soul.

It had lost to Miss Malvina friends, fortune and husband. The former had dropped off, one by one, on account of their pet specifics being rejected by either Miss Malvina or her organ; the second was a fine musical talent which she might have turned to account but for the same melancholy cause, and the third was perhaps the most dismal of all.

Col. Wilds, a gallant officer, had in the earlier days lost his heart to Miss Malvina, and would no doubt have married her, but during a sojourn in India he had fallen victim to a liver complaint, which so disgusted him with disorders of the human machinery, that any young woman possessed of so unpardonable a thing as an "organ" hadn't the remotest chance with the gallant officer.

Miss Malvina, therefore, was simply not in it at all. And so at the time our story opens we find Miss Malvina wretched, friendless, sickly and dependent upon a disagreeable old aunt.

To be sickly is bad enough without being friendless, but to be both and to have an "organ" into the bargain is hard luck indeed.

Mrs. Smithers, Miss Malvina's aunt, was a detestable person. She believed thoroughly in the text that a fool and his money are soon parted, and she obeyed the text to the letter. She had plenty of money and no heirs, but, like all misers, she did not consider that she had near enough, and she hoarded it up for Heaven knows what purpose.

She was in no wise a charitably disposed individual, though the fact of her giving a home to her orphaned niece might imply that she was. But no one would think so if he knew in what manner the home was held out.

"Deal Malvina," she wrote. "As you cannot starve, I suppose I must take you in."

And poor Malvina, whose organ had rendered her a meek and miserable mortal, responded weakly:

"Dear Aunt: As you say, I cannot starve and so I must accept your generous offer."

And when Miss Malvina arrived, in company with a goodly-sized apothecary shop, Mrs. Smithers' acerbity was by no means appeased.

"Bother your organ!" she exclaimed.

"It bothers me," returned poor Malvina.

This exclamation and pitiful rejoinder became an almost daily phrase.

Mrs. Smithers had not the slightest patience with her niece's membraneous receptacle, and at every meal such mortal enemies as hot bread pies confronted poor Malvina. The organ, naturally, cried out against such indignities, and Miss Malvina grew hourly worse.

Such torments as the poor thing knew no words can describe.

Finally, to Mrs. Smithers' utter horror, the family physician had to be summoned.

Nor was this the worst. After pre-

NAPANEE, FRIDAY, JULY 16th, 1897.

It has been announced over and over again that Sir Richard Cartwright was to be the next High Commissioner and take up his abode in London. There was some truth in the rumour, too, but many Grits and Tories are anxious that Sir Richard should stay in Canada. They say with much truth that Canada cannot afford to lose Sir Richard's services. These representations are likely to have the desired effect, and cause Sir Richard to remain in this country.

Sir Richard Cartwright was in town at the latter end of last week, and we are pleased to say was in vigorous health. This leads one incidentally to remark that Sir Richard is now a great man with the Conservatives. They have suddenly discovered that he is the embodiment of all the virtues, especially virtues political. Journals that have been in the habit of disparaging everything that the worthy knight did, and of abusing him in season and out of season, have now discovered their mistake, and lavish praise where censure was erstwhile bestowed.

has been proven, and we are sorry the Senate did not go on with its enquiry regarding the Drummond Counties Railway before adjourning. Meantime, Reformers should be careful not to be prejudiced against one of their ablest public servants. What has happened with regard to Sir Richard Cartwright may soon occur as to the Hon. J. I. Tarte, the minister of public works, and instead of being called everything that is bad, he may be lauded as the embodiment of everything that is good. The Tory press is so very uncertain just now.

LOOKING BACKWARD.

The Toronto World of Saturday last says:—

"One can often get a clearer view of things by using his imagination a little. And we ask our readers to try and grasp the situation as concerns Britain and her colonies in this Jubilee year by imagining Sir John Macdonald in England to-day instead of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Were the old chief alive, next to the Queen's, it would it be his jubilee. He foresaw and worked up to what has actually arrived. His would have been the master mind to suggest a broader national policy—an Imperial policy—for the situation. Sir John would have declared with no uncertain sound that it would be in the line of Imperal policy for the Mother Country and her colonies by treaty, by joint tariff legislation, by preferential arrangements, to have formulated a policy that would have built up trade between the various members of the British family, that would have resisted the encroachments of rival nations, that would have aided in securing peace and maintaining the dignity of our race. Sir John Macdonald did believe that nations and parliaments could promote their own welfare; Sir Wilfrid Laurier says his idea is the Cobden idea, that the least interference or even direction of trade is best. Instead of the Canadian Premier being an actual damper on the formation of a new and progressive Imperial policy, Sir John Macdonald would have supplied one that would have commanded the approval of the whole empire."

We think the writer has been sleeping and had a dream. After a chance of eighteen years duration, the late lamented Sir John did not accomplish very much in the way of better trade relations.

Look to it that You are well Guarded Against that Stealthy Enemy, Kidney Disease—South American Kidney Cure is the Only Remedy Which will Relieve at once and Cure.

I took South American Kidney Cure according to directions. I got immediate relief. The soreness and weakness all left. I can testify to the remedy being a wonderful cure." In addition to the officers appointed at the annual meeting, held a short time ago, the following were appointed directors. For Napanee, Dr. Leonard; Ernestown, Geo. Ham; Bath, J. J. Johnston; Adolphustown, Jacob H. Roblin; Richmond, Ira B. Hudgins; S. Fredericksburgh, C. Allison; N. Fredericksburgh, H. Meng; Amherst Island, Alex. McKee. This brought the business of the meeting to a close, and Mr. Aylsworth took the platform and announced his intention to accept the nomination.

This was received with every demonstration of applause, and Mr. Aylsworth was assured of the hearty support of all present.

There was a little feeling of chagrin among some of the Reformers present, caused by the iron bounties. We can't say, of course, not having yet asked the question, how Mr. Aylsworth feels about the iron bounties, but probably he thinks as does the Express, that this bounty and subsidy business must soon come to an end.

The Only Perfect Dye stuffs in the World.

The scientific preparation of dyestuffs and putting them up in proper shape for family dyeing has been brought to perfection by Wells & Richardson Co., who are proprietors of the celebrated Diamond Dyes.

These popular dyes have banished from the homes of Canada madder, fustic, logwood, cochineal and all other antiquated dyestuffs. The work of home dyeing is now done quickly and successfully by Diamond Dyes; the process is one that would astonish our grandparents

To day millions all over the world use the scientific Diamond Dyes in preference to all others. Diamond Dyes commend themselves to all who use them, because they are the strongest, brightest and fastest, and the easiest to work with.

Diamond Dyes, like all other perfect and popular preparations, are largely imitated in style of package and the way they are put up. These imitations are worthless and adulterated dyes, ruinous to all kinds of goods and dangerous to handle. Great caution is advised when buying dyes for home use. Ask only for the "Diamond"; see that the name is on every packet.

They Are Good. Mr. Jas. Hagan, the well-known ex-alderman of Kemptville, Ont., says:—"For some years I have been greatly troubled with pain across my back. Urinary troubles caused me much loss of sleep, and I suffered from a tired worn out feeling. Dodd's Kidney Pills gave me relief in a short time. The pain in my back has disappeared, and I feel that I would be doing wrong not to recommend them to others suffering as I did. They are the best medicine I ever used."

Nor was this the worst. After prescribing all sorts of villainous compounds, which Miss Malvina's organ rejected with scorn, Dr. Calomel insisted that Miss Malvina should come to his private sanitarium, known as The Rest.

Mrs. Smithers was as one demented. She fumed and raged and almost tore her false hair, for the board alone, without medical attendance, was $25 a week.

But Dr. Calomel was quite as determined as she was, and at last, after a fearful struggle, he won the day.

Mrs. Smithers can hardly be said to have given in graciously, for as soon as the doctor went away she flounced into the miserable little hall room she allowed Miss Malvina, and where the poor thing was having a wrestling match with her organ, and exclaimed, vindictively:

"I wish that 'organ' of yours was in Gehenna!"

Poor Malvina! she wished so, too, if she didn't have to accompany it there, but it was not transplanted just for the wishing.

A few days later, in fear and trembling, Miss Malvina drove up in Dr. Calomel's own neatly-appointed brougham to the door of the Rest.

At the time of her arrival there were only three other patients—Mrs. Weeks, a chronic dyspeptic; Miss Paine, a combination invalid; and an old gentleman who was a bundle of nerves.

It was against the latter individual that Miss Malvina was particularly warned, the slightest irritating circumstance causing him to tear his hair and cry "Fire!"

For a week Miss Malvina rested, lying quietly on a neat little white bedstead, gazing at harmoniously-tinted walls. On the eighth day she was so much improved that she came down to dinner.

It was a unique banquet. The convives all brought bottles and spoons with them, and some took their drops before eating and some afterwards. Moreover, the bread was dry and the drinking water was hot.

Miss Malvina was introduced to her fellow invalids. Mrs. Weeks and Miss Paine, who were already at the table when she entered, and she was having a very nice time with them, comparing symptoms, when a footstep and a man's voice caused her to look up. Then there occurred to poor Miss Malvina the one event of her life.

The gentleman of the nerves and eccentric tendencies was none other than her old admirer, Col. Wilds.

Miss Malvina started and blushed and recognized him in a moment. His hair had turned white and he no longer wore a uniform, but he was the same gallant man—indeed, age had improved him.

Col. Wilds recognized Miss Malvina also, and their meeting was an interesting one.

"Why, bless my soul, Miss Malvina!" cried the colonel, "to think of our coming together again after all these years and under such delightful circumstances. What's your trouble?"

"An organ," murmured Miss Malvina.

"Only one?" exclaimed the colonel. "Why, I've got a thousand, and every one of 'em out of tune!"

Miss Malvina said she was sorry, and began inquiring about his symptoms.

The colonel entertained her with a list of the most intense horrors, and the meal passed off delightfully.

After dinner they played dominoes. It was a party of ghosts—pale faces, wasted hands, an occasional groan, enlivened [illegible]

ABE LINCOLN'S LOST LOVE.

The Story of the Woman Who Was His First Sweetheart.

An interesting story of Abraham Lincoln's first and most ardent courtship has just come to light in the little mountain Californian town of Calistoga, where the martyred President's early love dwells, a sweet old lady of 84.

Mrs. Susan Boyce is the name of the charming octogenarian, who, as Miss Susan Reid, of New Salem, on the Sangamon River, in Illinois, refused to marry the immortal war President in 1836. She dwells in a humble little cottage with her widowed sister, who is but a few years her junior. Her husband has been dead for many years, and her principal income is a pension which she draws by reason of injuries her husband received in the famous Black Hawk war while fighting side by side with Lincoln, whose friend he was.

Mrs. Boyce is an unusually bright woman, whose mental and physical powers are well preserved, and there is character in every expression, in all she says and does, even to the slightest nod or gesture. She is about such a woman as one familiar with Lincoln's early life might suppose he could have loved, for she still has a rugged beauty in spite of the snows of age, and it requires little effort to imagine that she was a remarkably handsome girl in 1836—not a doll-faced creature, but a woman of marked character. She is tall and stately in appearance, and her eyes are a grayish blue.

Sitting on the front porch of her humble home, Lincoln's first sweetheart was a beautiful picture of serene old age. Her speech flows gently and without a tremor as she recalls events of her girlhood thoroughly, yet without hesitation.

Clad in a plain black dress, with a becoming white cap, she folded her arms and gazed toward the mountains that rise gently a few hundred feet beyond the front yard, and said:

"I can truthfully say that I have never been sorry that I married Mr. Boyce rather than Abraham Lincoln. You ask why, perhaps? Well, I'll tell you why. I have always been a believer in love, in romance, in idealism. I have been a novel-reader and a lover of poetry.

Paine's Celery Compound The Great Tower of Safety.

Nervous diseases when aggravated by mental disturbances produce more cases of insanity in the hot weather than at any other season of the year.

Nervous headache, nervous dyspepsia, sleeplessness, and chronic constipation induce depression of spirits, extreme weakness, morbid fears, despondency and languor; from these dread insanity comes slowly and surely.

Nervous sufferers have a dread of hot weather. Finding themselves deeper in the pit of misery than they were in the spring and early summer they are in utter despair. Thousands whose cases have not been met by treatment they are now under are loudly calling for help.

There is hope and rescue for you, reader, if you are one of the sufferers. You are in need of Paine's Celery Compound, that great builder of the nervous system. Its vitalizing action commences with the first bottle you use. You soon begin to realize that you are daily drinking health. The volume of blood immediately increases in the arteries, and the body is fully fed and nourished. Your appetite becomes keen and natural, the tired nerves and brain are strengthened, and you feel impulses of health that cheer the soul.

A CYNOSURE.

His front name was Adolphus and his surname it was Brown.
The girls all said his mustache was the prettiest in the town.
His hair was a deep auburn and it crinkled up in curls
That made him the cynosure of all the village girls.

Now, being a cynosure, he had more or less conceit,
You could see it in his manner when he walked across the street.

...ormed from time to time by a hacking cough.

At a quarter of nine Mrs. Weeks' dropped a domino. Col. Wilds shrieked "Fire!" and they were all carried off and put to bed like babies.

In consequence of the excitement Mrs. Weeks and Miss Paine went to rest for another week, and the following evening

A LAME BACK.

ONE OF THE MOST PAINFUL OF MALADIES,

Miss Malvina and Col. Wilds sat down to a tete-a-tete game.

Miss Malvina could not help noticing how handsome her former lover had become, and how highly polished and pink his bald head was.

They were having a most charming game, when suddenly a moth miller sputtered into the gas and fell whizzing among the dominoes.

Immediately Col. Wilds went off.

Poor Miss Malvina was so overcome she scarcely knew what to do. Not liking to sit gazing at her old friend, who was behaving himself in a most childish and foolish manner, she hastily arose, and, walking across the room, took from her pocket a small box from which she extracted an "excitement pill," which she swallowed.

In a moment the colonel was at her side.

"Miss Malvina!" he cried, "what is it? You are ill!"

"It's only my organ," faltered Miss Malvina.

In his courtly sympathy Col. Wilds forgot his own ills.

After this for a week he and Miss Malvina sat down tete-a-tete, and during that time he never once exhibited a nerve, and she almost forgot that she even had an organ.

But happiness in this world is short lived and Fate is a cruel jade.

On the eighth evening, when the colonel and Miss Malvina were njoying the most harmonious game of dominoes they had yet played, and when each was touchingly reluctant to beat the other, a note was brought to Miss Malvina.

She tore it open and read:

"Dear Malvina—I pay for no well persons. I hear that you have entirely recovered, and that that miserable organ of yours performs its functions like a Christian.

"Come home at once."

Miss Malvina laid down the note and a tear fell among the dominoes.

"My dear Miss Malvina!" cried the colonel, sympathetically, "what is troubling you? Tell me, I beg!"

"Alas! Col. Wilds, I must leave this haven of rest."

"But why?"

"My aunt refuses to pay my board any longer."

"Allow me to do so!"

"Oh! Col. Wilds!"

"Why not? I'm a millionaire, unmarried and of age!"

Miss Malvina blushed like a schoolgirl.

"You are so kind—but what would the world say?"

"Nothing, if you will follow my wishes."

"What are they?" inquired Miss Malvina," innocently.

"Be my wife!"

"But Col. Wilds, my organ?"

"No objection whatever," answered the colonel, cheerfully; "it counteracts my nerves."

Poor Miss Malvina; all the physics in the world had been tried upon her and all had failed, for no one had ever thought of giving her a dose of happiness. That dose being administered, her recovery was rapid and complete.

One day there was a quiet little wedding to The Rest, and afterwards, as Miss Malvina—Miss Malvina no longer—threw all her medicines out of her window, she said to herself:

"Dear me; did I ever think I'd live to see the day when I would bless my organ!"—Ladies' World.

A New Source of Power.

A new and simple source of power is proposed for engines and is declared to be not only practicable, but advantageous in respect to the latter, it being claimed that the material producing the power can be used continuously without the necessity of renewal. According to this idea, originating with Hermann Poppe, of Hamburg, Germany, a mixture is employed of ammonia vapor and carbolic acid gas, eventually under access of steam, which, however, is not essential, and thus, by the expansion of the gas mixture entering under pressure, a cooling of the vapors in the cylinder of the engine is produced. In this way a salt of ammonia is formed by a smaller or larger part of the gas mixture, and this salt, as provided in the subsequent operation, is returned to a disintegrating apparatus, working under pressure, in order to be disintegrated by heat into its volatile components, which latter are again utilized for power purposes.

Mr. Peter Millar Suffered for Years, and Experimented with Many Medicines Before Finding a Cure.

From the Brockville Recorder.

Perhaps no prettier place is to be seen in Ontario than that at Newman's upper lock on the Rideau Canal. At this station for a quarter of a century resided Mr. Peter Millar, who during that period acted in the capacity of lockman, and was perhaps the best known man on the canal. Mr. Millar is now a resident of Merrickville, having retired from active life. To a correspondent of the RECORDER he related the following experience: "For many years I was troubled with a lame back, which gave me great pain at times, and caused me much loss of sleep. I tried different kinds of medicine but found little or no relief. The spring of 1895 I was assisting at getting out ice one day when I felt something snap or give way in my back, and it was some time before I could straighten myself up. I now became so bad that when I laid down I was unable to rise without assistance, and I fully made up my mind that I had become a chronic invalid, and never expected to see a well day again. A couple of weeks after my back had almost entirely given out, I saw by an article in a paper that Dr. Williams' Pink Pills had cured a person troubled similarly, and I immediately sent and procured a box to test them. Before I had finished the box I found my back somewhat stronger so I procured five boxes more and by the time they were used I found myself completely cured. Since I took the last box I have not had a pain or particle of lameness, and my health has been far better than it had been for years before.

To ensure obtaining the genuine always ask for Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, as there are many pink colored imitations.

"IN SICKNESS AND IN HEALTH."

Man and Wife join Hands in Proclaiming the Great South American Nervine King of Cures for Stomach Trouble and Nerves.

Mr. S. Phillips, of Wiarton, Ont., writes: "I was very much emaciated by chronic dysentry and dyspepsia for a number of years. No remedy or no physician seemed to successfully cope with my case. When all else had failed I read of the cures being effected by South American Nervine. I decided to give it a trial. Before I had taken half a bottle I was much improved and felt greatly relieved. A few bottles of it have made me a new man. I am better and healthier than I have felt for years." His wife was also a great sufferer from stomach trouble and headaches. She says: "Seeing the wonderful effect it was having on my husband, I tried it also. The remedy gave me almost instant relief, and has cured and made a strong woman of me." Sold by A. W. LINCOLN'S FIRST LOVE. MRS. SUSAN BOYCE.

I believe, too, in fate. It was not fated for me to marry Lincoln. He was an honest young man, but I did not love him. Why? I don't know, but I do know this, love is a thing that you can't force. In the first place he was homely, and very awkward. He was only a common rail-splitter when I knew him, but he studied hard in his little cabin, and he was very entertaining. I never saw him after 1837 and I never heard him make a speech.

"He used to talk of the stars a great deal, and he seemed to me a very queer fellow. I was only a girl when I knew him, for I was born in 1815 in Kentucky, and I first met Mr. Lincoln in 1836 at the home of a neighbor named Able. We were both guests at the house for the day. There were many young folks there, and I remember that Lincoln was very bashful. My father was at that time one of Lincoln's best friends. His name was Lewis C. Reid, and he took Lincoln to Springfield and introduced him to William E. Seward, from whom he borrowed the first law books he ever read. He and my father were of the same political faith, and they often talked politics by the hour.

"But the smooth-faced and awkward young man whose memory the nation has long revered soon began to pay me more attention than he did my father, and this pleased my father more than it did me. In those days there were no buggies to speak of, and the way young folks courted was to go out very often on a horseback ride together. Mr. Lincoln often took me out horseback riding, and though he was not as ardent a wooer as I've seen since he kept his case going pretty lively and pressed me very hard for an answer. He pretended that he never loved a girl before and would never love anybody as he loved me, and I think he meant what he said, but I did not want to marry him, much as I liked his common-sense, his absence of 'airs' and his great honesty, so I invented a story.

"I told him I was engaged to a young man in Kentucky, but he did not give up for this, though it cooled his ardor a little for a time. Finally he told my father he would call one day for his final answer, but I made it a point to be away from home and he never got over it. My father lectured me severely for my conduct. He wanted me to marry Lincoln and he afterwards told me what a little dunce I'd made of myself, but my mother took my part, for she believed love was a thing for each individual to settle in his or her own heart. I can say that I have never for one moment regretted that I did not marry Mr. Lincoln, for if I could not give a man my whole heart I'd never marry him for money or position."

Mrs. Boyce says she has often felt proud in a way that she knew so good a man as Lincoln and had his love and esteem, but she says such a thing as worrying over what "might have been" has never crossed her mind for a moment, as she is a fatalist pure and simple. "After more than three-score years," she said, "I can say that Lincoln was one of the best friends I ever had and one of the squarest men I ever knew. If he were alive to-day I'd be getting a bigger pension from the Government by reason of what my father and husband did for their country in the Black Hawk war."

The remarkable old woman who enjoys the distinction of having jilted Abraham Lincoln, says The San Francisco Call, has blue eyes and silvery hair, though it was once raven black. She is five feet seven inches tall, and is still active on her feet.

Value of Nuts as Food.

It is popularly believed that nuts are indigestible, and doctors agree that nuts and raisins after a full meal, or rich nut cakes, puddings or fritters, cause dyspepsia; but this is because they are eaten as luxuries after the appetite has been satisfied. Nuts, if well masticated, and eaten not as dessert, but in place of other food, are more nutritious and sustaining than many fruits and vegetables, and are said to be specially valuable as brain and nerve builders. They may be eaten uncooked, in the usual way, or in sops, sandwiches, salads, or cooked with vegetables; for instance, egg plant with nut stuffing. Peanut or chestnut sandwiches are an approved delicacy.

His very air proclaimed aloud to everyone in town:

"Say, don't yo uthink I'm handsome? My name's Adolphus Brown."

Well, so it went for several years. Adolphus cut a dash,
But being a cynosure doesn't pay in ready cash,
And, finally, his father brought the youth up with a jerk,
And he said, says he: "Adolphus, you have got to go to work."

Now, when Adolphus heard these words, and thought what they implied,
His first thought was that he would go and be a suicide;
But of nerve to swallow poison, he found there was a lack,
And the thought of a revolver sent cold shivers down his back.

And so Adolphus still survives, with his mustache and his curls,
And he still is a cynosure for all the village girls;
In fact, he's rather more so now than he ever was before,
For he's selling lace and ribbons in Mc. Closkey's bargin store.

The edges are machine stitched, and the case ties with bows of ribbon.

A Famous Markswoman.

Mrs. David Day, of Duluth, probably handles a shotgun better than any woman in the country. She is at present attending the gun club meets throughout the West in the interest of The Western Field and Stream of St. Paul. At Des Moines recently, the first day of the shoot there, she tied Heikes, the champion of the United States, at inanimate targets. Later she was tied with Budd and Grimm, the champions of Iowa. A Des Moines paper says of her work: "The score made by Mrs. Dr. Day, of twenty straight targets out of a possible twenty, was considered the feature of the shooting yesterday. It won her first money in the particular match. Her shooting was very pretty and her manner excited much favorable comment. She was quick as lightning and broke every target square, not finding it necessary to claim scratch hits."

Shirt Waists Up to Date

Of course a shirt waist, to be a shirt waist, must conform to certain rules, but it may be decorated according to fancy.

Very dainty little summer shirt waists are made of plain muslin in bright colors and are quite as stylish as those of silk. A smart cotton shirt waist is built of delft blue chambray, with a pointed yoke at the back, small tucks forming a yoke effect in front.

Plaid waists, in both cotton and silk, are en regale, and are finished with a belt of plaid and stock of the same. These are shown you by the dealers as the latest novelties. They will be much worn throughout the summer season with crash and linen skirts.

Not to Be Expected.

Recently in Belfast two farmers who had come in for the weekly market, after transacting their business, made their way to a public building, where the portrait in oils of a local church dignitary was hung.

The harsh, ascetic countenance of the reverend gentleman was by no means softened by the slovenly manner in which the colors had been laid on.

After a short and silent view one of them broke forth with the remark that "his riverance had nae a very pleasant face."

"Houts, man!" rejoined the other; "cud ye expect the like after sich a dose o' oil!"—Answers.

THE NEW FASHIONS.

Kate Reily, the London Fashion Correspondent, Gives Pointers.

Paris has issued her fiat, but Paris is no longer omnipotent in our great world of fashion. Inventive she may be and cunning in devising new shapes and color combinations, and then, she has tradition in her favor, since, from time immemorial, the words "Paris" and "Fashion" have been almost indissolubly united. On the other hand, however, she often makes mistakes. The mondaines in France are comparatively few. The really smart English women are tremendously superior to any other women in the world, and they buy as much in their own capital now as in Paris.

Women often halt between two opinions, and not even sartorial talent can declare what will be the most popular among many innovations. The width round the shoulders is sensibly decreased, but I shall make very little alteration in the circumference of the skirts, which, although no longer so stiff as of yore, are still very wide and often trimmed to look wider. The newest skirt of all and the prettiest is accordion-plaited, narrow at the waist and widening out at the bottom, and is known to fame as "La Soleil." In foulard and canvas the happiest effects are obtained, these being the summer materials par excellence.

Here is an evening gown on which I am prepared to pin my faith. It is made of a mixture of orange-hued miroir velvet and satin, the velvet coming up in an irregular line onto the skirt, but the joining is cleverly concealed by the rich embroideries of diamonds, silver and big pearls in exquisite trailing design. Sometimes, as the light catches it, satin and velvet both seem the same shade, then a shadow falls upon it, and the orange velvet blends imperceptibly into lemon satin, with the silver, the diamonds and the pearls shimmering over all. The bodice draperies are arranged in like fashion, but with a softening of chiffon, and the mauve orchids, which adorn one sleeve, are made of deep-hued velvet, shading into paler silk.

Another evening gown is of white satin, with straps of diamonds, emeralds and pearls embroidered on the bodice, and with this I suggest a garniture of rose red, pale pink and paler mauve, sweet peas, and a full, plain, satin skirt.

A popular street frock has an accordion plaited skirt and bolero coat, made of wine-colored face cloth, combined with claret velvet. The coat is slashed and bound together again to fit the figure perfectly with stripes of broad, black braid. Tabs of this velvet are thrown back in front, and at the back are wired revers of point lace over gray, with edgings of chinchilla, while the creamy old point lace falls over a vest of pale blue silk. Such a gown is well adapted for wear on cool days, and is admirable for seashore service.

Skirts must fit snugly about the hips to be stylish; all fullness disappears in the plaited ones as the waist line is approached.

KATE REILY.

An Even Thing.

"Sir," began the man with the newspaper in his hands, as he turned to the man on his right, "this is an age of deception."

"I quite agree with you," was the reply.

"Nothing is what it seems to be."

"No, nothing."

"For instance, you are trying for the last twenty minutes to get hold of my watch. I wear a chain, and the natural inference is that there is a watch at the end of it."

"But there is no watch?"

"No, sir. I wear the chain for an ornament. You have simply thrown away your time."

"And on your part," said the man who had failed, "you took this pin in my scarf for a real diamond, and have made no less than three trials to secure it."

"And it is not a diamond?"

"No, sir—only a dry goods store rhinestone, but I wear it for ornament, and it serves my purpose. You have wasted your energies. It's an even thing, and let's go for that old duffer as he gets off the car and whack up on the boodle."

Riches in Sight.

The beautiful young girl flung herself at her stern father's feet.

The only hope I have of retrieving my fortunes is the possibility of your making a good match. You know this, and still you persist in pleading for that beggar, Jack Austin. No, you shall never marry him, so make

A GAME OF TAG.

I was looking from the window,
At the garden yesterday,
Where, beneath the bare old oak tree,
A heap of brown leaves lay,
When, suddenly, the north wind
Came frolicking that way
And up the brown leaves started
And "Tag" began to play.

Like airy sprites, all over
The garden they did flit,
And never seemed to falter
In their mad race a whit,
And, though I saw that many
Were by the others hit,
So fast they went that no time
Could I tell which was "it."

WINSTON'S BEQUEST.

By HELEN BEEKMAN.

"Oh, yes, sentiment's well enough in its way, but, after all, one needs substantial food upon which to live. It's an old adage about love flying out of the window when poverty enters the door, but its very age enforces our reverence. If it had not been true it would not have been handed down for so many generations," and the speaker, Star Ralston, leaned back with a saucy smile on the lovely face, the eyes, which had given her her name of Star, searching those of the young man, whose own face had paled under the words.

"Then wealth is an absolute necessity to your happiness, Miss Ralston?" he half questioned, half asserted. "Are you sure, quite sure, nothing could fill the gap its loss would make?"

But some one entering checked the answer on the girl's lips. What needed Dale Ferrars more? Had he not already heard that which doomed him?

"Hellos, Dale! What is it now? You are pale as any ghost," exclaimed a voice from the depths of an easy chair, a voice smothered in clouds of smoke, as Dale Ferrars, an hour later, entered his room, to find Elliot Winston already in possession. The two had been friends for years, sharing the same suite of apartments, and brothers in all but the tie of blood; yet many wondered at the close intimacy between them. One nature was frank, open, trustful; the other cold, cynical and suspicious.

"It's no use, Elliott, old fellow," Dale answered, throwing himself in a chair opposite, "I can never win her!"

"And may I inquire whom the pronoun designates?" But around the questioner's mouth crept a wary smile, while his eyes grew steel-like in their hardness.

"Whom! Oh, Elliot, don't torment me further! You know there is for me but

The jungles of Africa are not the only places in the world where a man courts death from an unseen foe. All the savages of all the barbarous nations of history have not slain one tithe of the men that have been killed by that dread assassin—consumption. One-sixth of all the deaths in the world are due to it.

Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery cures 98 per cent. of all cases of consumption. It cures by going to the very root of the evil—imperfect and improper nutrition. It corrects all disorders of the digestion, makes the appetite keen and assimilation perfect. It drives out the impurities from the blood and fills it with the life-giving elements that build up the body. It is the greatest blood-maker and purifier. When you pump rich, red, healthy blood into an organ it cannot long remain diseased. This is true of the lungs. New healthy tissue is built up in them and the germs of consumption are driven out. Thousands have testified to their cure by this great remedy. Druggists sell it.

Ralph Green, Esq., of Williamsburg, Callaway Co., Mo., writes: "Before I commenced your treatment I could not take a drink of water without great suffering in my stomach. I could not eat. I was fast sinking and did not weigh more than 135 pounds. To-day I weigh 157. I had five different doctors examine me, and each one treated me without doing me any good. At last I took four or five bottles of your 'Golden Medical Discovery,' and to-day am in better health than I have been for five years. Whenever I see any of my friends suffering I tell them of your medicine and advise them to write to you."

Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets cure

"A fortune-hunter like the rest, is she, my boy! Don't be discouraged. To bed and dream of the good the Fates hold in store for you. Follow my example—let nothing interfere with your rest," and, rising with a yawn, he disappeared through the communicating door into his own bedroom, but with it once closed between them the mask fell from his features, an angry frown gathered on his brow.

"He loves her, and is so blind that he does not see how entirely she returns it, and I—I love her, too; yet with all my gold I cannot buy one smile such as she wastes on him. But by fair means or foul I will win her yet."

"You've lost this money, Elliot—$20,000 in bonds—here from our rooms!" exclaimed Dale Ferrars a week later, confronting his friend, who had just overwhelmed him with the terrible news.

"It's bad enough!" the other answered, but his eyes wandered restlessly about the room, never meeting the frank, open gaze of his friend, while the deadly pallor on his cheek bespoke a sleepless night and a mind ill at ease.

"But are not the bonds marked in some way that you can identify them? Have you no clew to the thief?"

"Yes," he answered, "I have their numbers, and this is the worst part of it, Dale, old fellow; you know, of course, I don't believe it, but the detectives who have the case in charge insist upon searching your things—"

"My heaven, Elliot! And you would permit it?"

"Not if I had my own way for a moment, but it has gone beyond my jurisdiction, they say, and, in fact, they are waiting in the next room now. It's all a matter of form, Dale, after all. Let them go through it, and they will be content—"

"Bid them enter," commanded the young man, proudly, standing with knit brows and folded arms, but the murmur: "Et tu, Brute," escaped through his clenched teeth.

Once as they opened his trunk he started forward. Star's picture was hidden there. How terrible that their eyes should defile it! But in another moment they interpreted the start according to their own satisfaction, as from a compartment from the very bottom of the trunk they drew forth in triumph the missing property, not a bond wanting.

"You'll trust us another time, Mr. Winston," he heard them say.

"I can't believe it yet; but go on further. The property is found. Do not expose him—"

"Too late for that now," they replied, as they stooped to slip the handcuffs upon him.

"Not that!" he exclaimed, breaking from them, a red flush for the first time signalling his shame upon his cheek. "I am a gentleman, and will go with you as a gentleman," and, without one backward glance at the man who stood white and trembling by his recovered bonds, he turned and let the detectives lead him whither they would.

The city rang with the strange story and the noble efforts of Elliot Winston to save the friend who had betrayed him from exposure. Such unselfishness! Such rare nobility! But there was one who listened to the news without one moment's wavering in her pure belief.

"He is innocent!" she said, when they had finished. "As innocent as I am. Dale Ferrars never was a thief!" But when in her own room she recalled the past her words, "as innocent as I am," rose once more before her.

"Am I innocent?" she questioned. Did I not always say money was my great ambition? If he did it, did he not do it for my sake? I, who would have gone to the ends of the world with him, waited on him, served him and asked no greater happiness—but he never did it. My Dale could do nothing mean!"

"Oh, Mr. Winston!" exclaimed Star, a few mornings later, entering her drawing-room, where her visitor stood awaiting her. "How glad I am to see you—to see some one who shares my belief in Dale Ferrars' innocence—"

"Would that I could share it, Miss Ralston."

"But you do not! Are you not working for his release?"

"I can never forget that he was my friend. The world construes my efforts for him into belief in his innocence, and my loyalty keeps me silent; but, alas! I fear they are powerless. His guilt is too evident."

"He was never guilty!" rang out the clear, young voice, while the small head raised itself proudly and the violet eyes flashed. "I would stake my life upon it."

"Stake nothing so precious, Miss Ralston, in deciding, and let me, who may cause by deed rather than word!"

He had spoken too rapidly for the girl to check his words. The torrent would not be stemmed.

"I cannot," she at last made answer.

"And why?"

"Because," she answered, proudly, "I love the man you call a thief—love him so dearly that I would rather have a prison cell with him than tread a castle with any other."

"What if I tell you on your decision rests Dale Ferrars' hope of acquittal? Do you love him well enough for such a sacrifice?"

"He would not wish it."

"What! he would rather pine long years in prison, disgraced and degraded? Listen, Star! Be my wife, and I will take such measures as will not only acquit him of punishment, but the deed. With money I can buy a man who will swear he was the thief, and placed the bonds in Dale's trunk."

"And are you sure he would not swear truthfully?" was the quick retort.

"But too sure to the contrary. Come, Star, decide. Be my wife, darling, and I will surround you with every luxury and trust to time to win your love!"

"Go find your witness," she answered. "Bring him to me. If there is no other way I will accept this."

"In two days I will return with him."

His victory was in his hand. For this he had worked, for this planned. This he had achieved, and a smile of exquisite triumph lighted Elliot Winston's face, as a few hours later, leaving Star, he leaned back in the comfortable railway carriage which was to bear him on his journey, and gave himself up to the delights of anticipation. Retrospect was less agreeable. But suddenly a sharp whistle rings out on the night air, a note of warning which strikes terror to every heart, which is followed by a crash, a glare, then blinding darkness. Out from the mass of broken timbers they drag a man's form and tenderly bear him, with many other suffering victims, to a hospitable farm house near by. Death is inevitable. In a few hours it must ensue. Once more Star's face and form are with him—the one thing that, in all these years, has grown into that sealed heart. His happiness is over now. Hers must be secured even at cost of truth and his fair name. What matters it what they say of the dead?

"Some one must write for me," he feebly says, and there are many to obey the call. "Darling," he dictates, "I have a sad story to tell you, but you will, I know, forgive the dead. Dale is innocent, dear, as you said. I stole my own bonds and placed them in his trunk. I was the thief and traitor as well. But I would have sold myself a hundred times to win one kiss from your lips. Use my confession to free him, but remember, I need not have made it. It is a bequest worthy of my love—darling—good-by— Elliot Winston."

With trembling hand he subscribed his own name, then sank back—dead.

Once more the city rang with the strange story, but this time Dale shared in its rejoicing. He was the hero of the hour, but it was in Star's eyes he found his triumph.—N.Y. Ledger.

Puzzling the Royal Society.

The proceedings of the Royal Society of London were not taken so seriously 150 years ago as they are now. A sailor who had broken his leg was advised to send to the Royal Society an account of the remarkable manner in which he had healed the fracture. He did so. His story was that, having fractured his leg, by falling from the top of a mast, he had dressed it with nothing but tar and oakum, which had proved so wonderfully efficacious that in three days he was able to walk just as well as before the accident. This remarkable story naturally caused some excitement among the members of the society. No one had previously suspected tar and oakum of possessing such miraculous healing powers. The society wrote for further particulars, and doubted, indeed, whether the leg had been really fractured. The truth of this part of the story, however, was proved beyond the shadow of a doubt. Several letters passed between the Royal Society and the humble sailor, who continued to assert most solemnly that his broken leg had been treated with tar and oakum, and with these two applications only. The society might have remained puzzled for an indefinite period had not the honest sailor remarked, in a postscript to his last letter:

"I forgot to tell your honors that the the leg was a wooden one."—Harper's Round Table.

A French chemist has discovered that alcohol can be produced very simply and easily from acetylene gas, at a cost not exceeding 16 cents per gallon and that it would be free from the essences which render vegetable alcohols unwholesome as the main ingredient of liquors.

"Oh, to be original!" sighed the young and promising author, as he gloomily surveyed the empty page of foolscap before him.

"I can imitate Kipling," he murmured, thrusting his fingers through his unkempt locks, "and I can imitate Dickens—pretty well. I can even scribble something more or less Shakespearean once in a while. But what avail such? Nothing! I must be original. Originality is the only thing that counts these days, and without it it is hopeless to sue for the favor of the public!"

Suddenly an idea occurred to him.

Planning out the simplest of plots, he sat down and wrote. Beginning at the bottom of the page at the right hand corner, he wrote to the left and upward.

II.

The reception rooms of the well-known society woman, whose ambition it was to hold salons every week, to which were invited the literary celebrities of the day, were crowded to the very doors.

"Who is that pale young man, my dear, with the wavy hair and the spiritual expression, surrounded by all those girls?" asked one stout matron of another.

"That, my dear? Why, that is the successful young author who conceived the original idea of writing his stories backward."

"Writing his stories backwards? But what does he do that for?"

"They do say he did it just to be quite different from anybody else, but it has proved so popular with his young SUMMER GIRL OF '97.

HER SHIRT WAIST, COLLAR, HAT, BUCKLES AND PARASOLS.

A Chief Feature in Her Make-Up Will Be Sweet Simplicity—An Endless and Fascinating Variety of Them to Charm the Sight of Men.

Simplicity, not flummery, will be the chief feature of the make-up of the Summer girl of 1897. Shirt waists will play an important part in her wardrobe.

The newest shirt waist is a thing of many tucks or pleats. The tucks, which are usually an inch wide, or even narrower, run horizontally over the entire waist. The newest sleeves are the shape of a man's coat sleeve, and are formed by a succession of the same width tucks that appear on the waist.

Another equally smart shirt waist is crossed and countercrossed by clusters of three tiny tucks, forming the effect of a large plaid.

Shirt waists destined for the tub are made with a small, inclined bishop sleeve gathered into a cuff at the band. These shirt waists are made of dimity, dotted swiss, cheviot or china silk, and have their quota of tucks and plaits, though differently disposed. The pret-

The Experiences of the Amateur on a Catboat Trip.

It will be remembered that the man who gets the half holiday off played baseball last week, and retired from the game with his spirit and several of his fingers broken. On Sunday he resolved that his next half day would be devoted to his home and garden. But on Monday, when two old friends called and sympathized with him and expressed the belief that his fingers would get into active shape in a day or two, and incidentally mentioned a catboat trip which they wanted him to join on the next Saturday. He fell into their scheme with alacrity.

HE SHIPS THE RUDDER

To be sure, he knew little or nothing about boats, and said so. But they laughed at that. No old sport, they said, had gone through so many years of life without imbibing some experience of boats. They chose to think that he was joking with them. "You'll show us," said they, "how a catboat ought to be sailed, and we shall appear lubbers beside you. Don't tell us you are a green boatman. We can't swallow that."

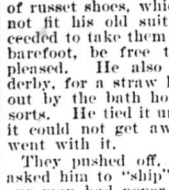
WITH THIS RESULT

By this time our man hoped that he was something of a sailor. In fact, he felt that he was a sailor, and he was not long in reaching the conclusion that his friends were going to be indebted to him for life after Saturday had come and gone. He could foresee several perilous situations which he was to rescue them from.

He promised to bring his share of supplies, and after the meeting place was arranged the two men went away. Saturday noon came. With it came a good high wind. Our man should have been scared. He had never sailed in a high wind in his life. Anyway, he started off with a basketful of the most unlikely food a sailor ever used. He had canned salmon, and nothing to open the can with. He had doughnuts and mixed pickles and club sandwiches and a bag of peanuts. Of course he had some wholesome food, but not enough to strike a balance against the other stuff. He dumped all these things into the locker and got ready for work.

Having been shod in a fine new pair of russet shoes, which in appearance did not fit his old suit of clothes, he proceeded to take them off, so that he could, barefoot, be free to slop about as he pleased. He also changed his hat, a derby, for a straw hat of the kind dealt out by the bath houses at seashore resorts. He tied it under his chin, so that it could not get away, unless his head went with it.

They pushed off, and his companions asked him to "ship" the rudder. Now, our man had never "shipped" a rudder, but he had an idea of what was wanted, so he sat down on the edge of the stern, and with his legs hanging over, tried to slip the pins on the steering gear into the small rings provided for them. With the boat rocking this was no easy task, and neither balancing nor swearing brought about the desired result. When one pin was all right the second one refused to strike the opening of the iron ring. When the second one slipped into place the first one promptly came out of its place, and the work had to be started all over again. Just as our man thought he was about to get both rings in position the boat gave a lurch and he promptly fell overboard carrying the rudder with him.



BECALMED

"You know a lot about shipping rudders," said the skipper sarcastically, while our man spluttered and struggled in the briny. "You ship one just as you would a package of scrap iron. Did you telephone to the mermaids that that rudder was going to be sent to them, and have you addressed it all right. Why don't you throw the boat overboard while you are about it? We don't want it now. What's the good of the old boat without a rudder, anyhow? I thought you were a sailor!"

Then they fished him out with a boat-hook and pulled in the rudder. Then the skipper and the rudder leaned over the stern. The skipper gave one quick push and the rudder fell into place.

They told off our man to get dry and hold the rudder straight. So, between An Awful Shock.

"If you knew who I was," said the tattered young man with dignity to the citizen he was importuning for a dime, "you'd be glad enough to give me the money!"

"Well, who are you, anyway?"

The tramp drew himself up with an important air.

"I'm Charlie Ross, de kidnapped child!"

The other walked on.

"You can't give me any story like that. It isn't worth ten cents."

"It's true, so help me"——

The citizen turned suddenly and asked:

"How old are you?"

"I'm twenty, boss," said the tramp, quickly. He didn't look it, but that was probably immaterial.

"Well, now I know you're a liar!" said the other, "for Charlie Ross was stolen in 1874, and he was four years old then, so if he were alive now he'd be twenty-seven years of age. Good day."

"Hold on, pard," said the tattered one; "dat's all right. It's true what I was tellin' yer. I oughter be twenty-seven now, but I'm only twenty, cos when I was kidnapped it scared me outer seven years' growth, see?"

The citizen seemed to think that that was worth the dime, for he gave it.

"MAKE HER A LITTLE SHARPER, SIR."

Roasted.

She spoke bitterly.

"You don't appreciate the sacrifices I make for you!"

He was inclined to be sarcastical.

"What sacrifices?" he demanded.

In answer she tossed her head.

He repeated the question sneeringly. "What sacrifices?"

She was bound to reply, but her tone was that of the injured in feelings.

"Well, isn't it enough that I never get a girl, and always cook the dinner myself? Isn't it enough that I cooked the dinner myself to-night? And yet you have the face to ask what sacrifices?"

He sneered again, this flinty-hearted man. He laughed a hard and harsh "ha!"

"Sacrifices, is it? Well, it's a burnt sacrifice at all events!"

So saying he savagely stuck his fork into the steak that had been broiled not wisely but too well, while she sobbed to beat the band.

We hear a great deal about purifying the blood. The way to purify it is to enrich it. Blood is not a simple fluid like water. It is made up of minute bodies and when these are deficient, the blood lacks the life-giving principle. Scott's Emulsion is not a mere blood purifier. It actually increases the number of the red corpuscles in the blood and changes unhealthy action into health.

If you want to learn more of it we have a book, which tells the story in simple words.

SCOTT & BOWNE, Belleville, Ont.

UP-TO-DATE SUMMER GIRL OF 1897.

tiest model has a cluster of seven quarter-inch tucks running horizontally on either side of the waist from the shoulder to the belt and extending right to the arm hole.

The cuffs are four inches deep and formed entirely of tucks. There is no space between any of this tucking, the tucks being laid as close to one another as possible.

The collar and collarette are now the shirt waist's crowning touch of glory, and of collarettes there are endless and fascinating varieties. The linen collar plays a decidedly second part and has dwindled into a mere narrow white line worn high and close about the throat and swathed in a stock that ties in a butterfly bow with pointed ends.

These stocks should invariably be black, unless fashioned of the same material as the shirt waist.

Collarettes are made to fasten invisibly in the back, and are fashioned of mousseline de soie, of plaited chiffon, of wash blone edged with thread lace, or are covered merely with soft folds of black or white tulle with a big, fluffy bow of this airy fabric tied under the chin. The magic touch of any one of these dainty arrangements for the throat will transform the most prosaic shirt waist into a garment fit to adorn almost any summer function.

The most chic trimmings used on sailor hats are wings and quills. Many of them are smothered in flowers and tulle. With the perfectly plain shirt waists perfectly plain sailor hats are still worn. They vary little from those of last season in their lines, except the crown is a trifle higher and the brim not so wide. A sailor hat of white Panama straw with a high bell-shaped crown, trimmed with a twist of black velvet ribbon ending in a bow of long loops on the side, from the centre of which rises two lace, broad black quills, is very good style. But the smartest sailor has a straight crown of medium height, is decidedly oval in shape, being quite short in the back. There are folds of moire about the crown, and on one side and well toward the front are a succession of long wings.

The summer girl must have a parasol to harmonize with every toilette. She will tolerate nothing that is not distinctly bell shape, with long, sharply curved ribs. Accordion plaited sunburst parasols she scorns with all the other eccentricities of their ilk.

Everyday Hosiery and Cycling Footwear.

In hosiery one sees some wonderfully dainty stockings. The spun silks are made with embroidered fronts in various colors, while very pretty stockings in black sun silk may be obtained embroidered with rosebuds in pale shades of pink, yellow and green. The stockings with the shaded vertical stripes, embroidered on a black background, are very effective, and the same must be said of the Lisle thread with black feet and ankles, and with tops either in pink, pale blue, cardinal or white. Among the other novelties in Lisle thread stockings, I must mention those with a drop stitch stripe. The plaid stockings (which are illustrated) are obtainable in various bright colorings. For useful everyday wear in the summer, nothing can possibly be nicer than the spun silk, which are procurable in various colors.

ardent cyclists, continues Madame, to the new cycling shoe. It can be had in black glace or tan leather. This shoe is made with a pure rubber sole, which is of almost endless wear. It is light and cool, gives beautifully to the foot, yet fits closely while allowing perfect freedom when pedaling. As will be seen in the sketch, it is finished with a neat little steel ornament just above the vamp. Another favorite cycling shoe is fitted with a flexible rubber waist and corrugated sole. It is after the style of the Oxford shape, with a strap across the instep. Always useful are the Oxford shoes in tan or box calf, and these are equally smart for walking or cycling, being finished with the Louis XV. shaped heel.

hold the rudder straight. So, between musing on his wetness and silently praising his foresight in removing the new russet shoes, he let the boat jibe, and the boom swung around and hit him on the head and knocked him overboard. So they fished him out once more and told him of to get dry all over again. By this time the water was coming into the boat through various orifices in the bottom and sides. These orifices were invisible, but their visible results made quite a barrelful of water.

A KNOCK OUT

Now our man had a little the best of it. The others had shoes on, and stockings, too. They were soaked through, and our man had a quiet laugh. He didn't like to say much, but they read his face and promptly gave him the hardest end of the bailing job. He succeeded in losing his tin pan overboard, and then he started to bail with his straw hat. Of course the bigger part of the water came back into the boat and a good part of it soaked into his clothes. There was no time now to be told off to get dry, so our man put the best face he could on the matter, and it wasn't a very good face at that.

Before the boat was properly rid of the unwelcome water a heavy breeze came along and lifted the boat with a bounce. All hands sprang to their posts. Our man's post was one of the sheets. They didn't "sheet," because by this time all hands knew that our man didn't know a sheet from a hand saw. So they just told him what rope to grab. Then another fellow grabbed another rope, and as the skipper had told our man to "hang on," he hung on. The rope the other man grabbed had some mysterious connection with our man's rope, so when it was pulled our man went right up to the masthead. The others didn't know it at the time, and they fastened their sheet to a cleat. About this time the boat heeled over and our man slid down his rope in time to hit the water with a good dull thud. The others were in various positions of peril, and all three wailed for help at the top of their voices. Then a tugboat came along and fished them all out, and our man went home with a four times wetting. The boat sank with a sigh of satisfaction, and all was over except the three severe colds which had just gotten under way. Of course, the skipper blamed everything on our man. That is his fate. Every time anything happens he is the scapegoat. He is used to it, but he comes up smiling for new events and catastrophes.

Harry Wilder, of Kingston, had a narrow escape from serious injury one day last week. He was wheeling out the York road, and when near Westbrook tollgate, saw a runaway team coming. He kept well on the right hand side of the road, the horses being on the opposite side. Just as they neared him the animals swerved to the right side of the road, the rear wheel of the rig striking Mr. Wilder's bicycle. The rider was tossed into the ditch, his wheel being thrown on top of him. Beyond a few scratches and a general shaking up he was uninjured. One side of his face is skinned where it came in contact with the gravel. Strange to say his bicycle also escaped injury.

A Quiet Wedding.

On Thursday of last week, Mr. G. W. Waggott, the new proprietor of the Campbell house, was married to Miss Alzina McKibbon, the only daughter of Mr. D. D. McKibbon, Milford. The ceremony was performed at St. Mary Magdalene's church, Picton. Rev. Rural Dean Loucks officiating. Only a few of the nearest relatives and friends being present. Orange Excursion.

On Monday last the Orangemen of Napanee and the neighboring section held an excursion to Watertown where they participated in a monster demonstration at that place. They went by train to Kingston, leaving here at 6.30. A large number of people were picked up along the line. At Kingston they boarded the steamer St. Lawrence to Cape Vincent where a train was in waiting to convey them to Watertown. The excursion was accompanied by the Citizen's Band, and we are glad to say that the boys acquitted themselves in a most creditable manner. The music furnished by the band was favorably commented upon.

Fire.

On Tuesday evening last, shortly after 5 o'clock, an alarm of fire was sounded from box No. 6. The firemen promptly responded and when they reached the scene found a barn in the rear of Jehiel Aylsworth's house, on Donald street, to be on fire. The flames had gained considerable headway before being discovered, and the building was ablaze before the brigade arrived. A stream of water was soon put on and before many minutes elapsed the blaze extinguished. The supposition is that the place was set on fire. We must congratulate the brigade on their rapid work. We have a fire brigade that cannot be equalled in many cities.

Narrow Escape.

On Friday evening last, little Helena Edwards, daughter of Mr. Evan J. Edwards, Division Court Clerk at Deseronto, had a narrow escape from drowning. While the family were at tea they heard a splash in the direction of the back door, but they thought nothing of it for a few moments. Going to the door they found the little one coming in all dripping wet. It appears she had climbed on a box to dip out some water from a tank, with a cup and tumbled headlong in, but in turning over came to the top, to which she clung and managed to clamber out without assistance. She was none the worse for her thrilling experience.

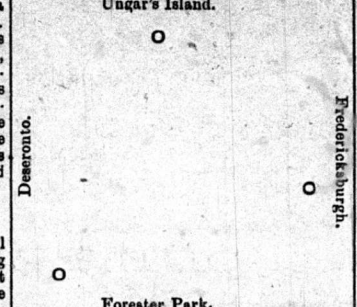
THE YACHT RACES.

SLOW TIME OWING TO LIGHT BREEZE.

They Were Well Attended — The Reindeer Took a Good Crowd.

On Friday afternoon last the second of the series of yacht races under the auspices of the Napanee yacht club was held on the bay opposite Deseronto. The Str. Reindeer left Napanee at 1 o'clock, with a large party on board. She also towed the entire fleet to the course. The day was scorching hot and there was not much breeze. The boat reached Forester Island shortly after 2 o'clock when the first gun was fired. The course was triangular the starting buoy being up the bay off the pavilion at the island, the second buoy off Fredericksburgh shore and the third buoy off Ungar's Island.



Forester Park.

By an arrangement made previous to the race the Dauntless was to give the other boats an advantage, the terms of which were that if there was a reefing breeze the Dauntless was to go three times around the course to twice of the other boats, besides the time allowance. The start was made at 2.48. The Dauntless was the first to cross the line followed by the Madge, Orpha and Petrel, the Satisfaction coming soon after. The Skip Jack and Star unfortunately did not watch their time and were some distance from the flag when the gun was fired. The Dauntless at the firing of the gun put out her spinnaker and catching the breeze shot ahead. The Madge Orpha and Petrel followed suit and kept well together on the first leg. They did not seem to head the buoys very well and held up the bay. The Madge rounded the buoy first, followed close by the Orpha and Petrel. Satisfaction had the breeze she required and after rounding the buoy closed the gap between the Petrel and when almost half the second leg was covered, overhauled and passed her. The Skip Jack passed the Star on the first leg and kept in that place to the finish. It was of course a foregone conclusion that the Dauntless would hold her lead throughout and therefore the interest centered in the Madge, Orpha, Petrel and Satisfaction, between whom there was a good race. The Madge rounded the third buoy first and headed down the bay on tack. The Orpha followed in her course but did not go as far down—only half the distance when she came about for the starting buoy. In this move she seemed to get the lead on the Madge and rounded the buoy first. At this point the Satisfaction and Petrel were fighting for supremacy, but the wind was with the Satisfaction and having made a shorter tack than the Petrel, stood for the starting buoy which she rounded first; she was however closely followed by the Petrel and was not much in the lead when the start was made on the second round of the couse. The Madge and Orpha at this time were well toward the Fredericksburgh shore and each headed better for the buoy than on the first round. The Orpha rounded first followed about half a minute by the Madge. The Satisfaction and Petrel were running almost even, each with spinnaker set. The spinnaker of the Satisfaction seemed to be too light and would not hold place with the wind. Skipper Carson in his anxiety to hold it down sat upon the boom when it broke. Not to be outdone a pikepole was brought into service. In this she lost a little time, but when everything was put to rights she again took the lead which she held to the third buoy. The Madge and Orpha were having an even contest on the second leg and at times ran even. One advantage the Orpha had over the Madge was her topsail for when the Madge was to the windward of the Orpha the latter craft would have been blanketed had not the topsail of the Orpha caught what breeze she could get. The Madge rounded

The mystery connected with the kidnapping of "Charlie Ross" has been revealed. Sixteen years ago workmen were engaged in tearing out a basement at New York where they found the skeleton of a boy. Gilbert Mosher told his son William that this was all that remained of the body of Charlie Ross, who was murdered in the house. William has a son Ellsworth, who lives in New York. He has revealed the mystery of the fate of the long lost boy.

A dredge while at work near Capt. Reid's dock, Sacketts Harbor, on Friday last brought to the surface an old cannon, which was safely landed upon the deck of one of the mud scows. Upon examination it proved to be of very ancient design, about five feet in length and twenty inches butt, and sixteen inches at the nozzle, with nine inch bore reimbursed with iron bands or rings, and weighing about 1,500 pounds. There seems to be no doubt that this gun was captured by the Americans from the British at Little York, now Toronto, during the war of 1812, and it is a very valuable relic of that war.

A Sad Death.

About two months ago Miss Cora Clancy, Centreville, went across to Boonville, Oneida County, N. Y., to visit her aunt, and expecting to soon return home again. On Friday July 2nd, she was stricken with paralysis, and so severe was the shock that she died that same evening. She was aged only twenty-eight years, and was popular with a wide circle of friends, who deeply mourn her sudden demise. The remains were taken by her father to Centreville for interment.

Died on the Track.

At the Trenton races, last week the horse Dyksie, owned by S. Harkness, of Kingston, dropped dead on the track. The first heat of the 2:29 pacing race was being contested. Dyksie drew eighth place among eight starters, and when a point 150 yards from the winning post had been reached, he had fought his way to second place. At this point his jockey, Fred Metcalfe, heard a deep groan from the horse and felt him shiver in his harness. Divining that all was not right with the animal. Fred drew rein and slackened Dyksie's speed. He held second place, however, until he passed under the wire, when he dropped in his tracks, and in two minutes was dead. A veterinary surgeon who was on the ground gave it as his opinion, after an examination of the horse, that his death was caused by the excessive heat. Dyksie was six years old and had a record of 2.29¼. Mr. Harkness valued him at $500. Dyksie, to all appearances, was in the best of health and spirits when he was led for the first heat, and frisked and played with his jockey as he was being led to the hitching-up point. Dyksie was well known here as he figured very prominently at the races on July 1st.

Again Destroyed by Fire.

About three o'clock Saturday morning last the general store of Neilson & Co., Conway, was discovered to be on fire. Every effort was made to arrest the progress of the fire, but the fire-fighting appliances being inadequate, the efforts of the people proved no avail. The store with its contents was entirely destroyed. There was insurance to the amount of $700 on the store, and $500 on the stock. There was over $1,000 worth of stock in the store at the time. A year ago last 24th May, Neilson & Co., sustained serious loss in the destruction of their store, which was struck by lighting and was burned to the ground. A new edifice was erected, and opened only about two months ago. The stock it contained was new. The drive shed of W. Wright, which adjoined the general store, together with rigs and harness, was also consumed by the fire Saturday morning last. It was close to the building in which the flames broke out and so was doomed from the beginning. The residence of Mr. Wright narrowly escaped destruction. Just how the fire started is not known, as every precaution was taken to prevent such disaster. It is likely another store will replace the one burned.

Evil for Good.

On Monday night last a stabbing affair took place at Centreville, and the victim now lies in a precarious condition. Mr. Wm. Fingland, who lives with John Lockridge, was in the village attending the Orange demonstration. He appears to have partaken of too much liquor, and on his way home became tired and laid down to sleep. Mr. David Cameron, when on his way home, found him. He aroused him and asking him where he wished to be taken, was told to take him to Mr. Lockridge's. Mr. Cameron took him to the house and upon arriving there Fingland accused him of taking from his pocket a bottle of whiskey. Cameron said he did not take it, and opened his coat to allow Fingland to search him. While Cameron had his coat held open with both hands engaged Fingland stabbed him on the right side, just below the lung. Medical aid was summoned and Cameron is now lying in a precarious condition, it not being yet known what the result will be. Constable Huff went out and arrested Fingland on Tuesday morning, and upon receiving a preliminary hearing was remanded to jail for eight days in order to see what would be the result of the wound inflicted on the man who was assaulted while doing an act of kindness.

Refreshments were served by the ladies after the first round, after which play was resumed. the buoy first followed close by the Orpha. The Satisfaction and Petrel were not far behind, and when on the home stretch the four crafts were about even. On this run the breeze seemed to change and the boats had to sail close. The Madge, however, came well down the bay, followed by the Orpha. The latter craft did not make as long a tack as the Madge and again gained an advantage, rounding the buoy a few minutes ahead. The interest was now centred between the Satisfaction and Petrel. The former craft was in the lead owing to a short tack and rounded the buoy first. When the Orpha rounded the buoy at the finish the Dauntless was almost at the third buoy on the third round. She did not fill her agreement and thereby lost the race. The following table shows the winner of the race and the time of each.

	Start.	Finish.	Act.	Cor.
* Dauntless	2.48	4.35.45	1.35.45	1.35.45

The sport was enjoyed by those on the Reindeer.

The financial statement which appears in the official Gazetteis in every way very satisfactory. The revenue of the year ending 30th June last, shows an increase of about a million and a quarter over that of last year, while there is a nominal surplus on consolidated revenue, of $5,500,000 but as all the items of expenditure are not included, this will be greatly reduced. At any rate there is likely to be a small surplus for the year, a better showing than was predicted by Mr. Fielding.

PARISH OF ADOLPHUSTOWN—Services next was held on Monday evening.

Present, H. M. Deroche, chairman; Messrs. Cowan, Coates, Hanley, Grange, Templeton, Herrington, Ashley, Preston, Wright, Henry, Boyes.

Minutes of last session read and confirmed.

A communication was read from Mr. F. C. Anderson applying for position as teacher of Senior IV at Model School for the term of 1897 at a salary of $200 per term. Referred to committee on teachers to report.

A communication from Miss Maggie O'Brien enclosing a testimonial from the school section where she has been teaching was read.

A communication from Mr. F. Burrows, school inspector, recommending the appointment of Miss Hypatia Fox as primary teacher at the model school, was read.

The report of the committee on teachers which was laid over from last session was taken up. The second clause in the report recommending the dismissal of Mr. A. G. Wilson, science master, on the ground that pupils are finding fault with his teaching.

Mr. Herrington made a strong plea in behalf of Mr. Wilson, not for any personal friendship for Mr. Wilson, because he has spoken to him but twice since he came to town, but in the interest of justice and fair dealing. The only ground the board had for their action towards Mr. Wilson were the complaints of a few pupils. If the board were to listen to the complaints of pupils against teachers, and act upon them, they would soon dismiss nearly all the teachers on the staff. He moved, seconded by Mr. Hanley, in amendment, that Mr. Wilson be re-engaged at the same salary as last year.

Mr. Deroche said that one of the teachers of the Institute told him that if Mr. Wilson was dismissed on the complaint of pupils, he would consider it time for him to look out for another position.

Mr. Preston said that every member of the committee were satisfied with the report as presented. He said that Mr. Wilson had been engaged for a certain purpose, and if he was not competent to fill the position then he should be discharged. This board, in the interest of the school must have an efficient teacher for the science department.

Mr. Herringtons amendment was put and carried on a division of 8 to 3.

Mr. Herrington reported verbally that the ladies to whom the kindergarten furniture had been loaned had given him notice that they were through with it. He recommended that the property be removed from the present premises and placed in the West Ward School.

The Finance Committee presented the following estimates for 1897-98.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

	1896 97	1897-98.
Expenditure	$5,420.00	$5,320.00
Income	795.00	750.00
Required from town	$4,625.00	$4,570 00

HIGH SCHOOL.

Expenditures	$7,060.00	$6,810.00
Income	4,210.00	4,200.00
	$2,850.00	$2,610 00

Moved by Mr. Herrington, seconded by Mr. Preston, that Miss Hypatia Fox be engaged as primary teacher at the model school in place of Miss Aylsworth, resigned. Lost.

Moved by Mr. Cowan, seconded by Mr. Henry that the matter be referred to the committee on teachers. Lost.

Moved by Mr. Hanley, seconded by Mr. Henry that Miss O'Brien be appointed to the vacancy. Lost.

Moved by Mr. Preston, seconded by Mr. Herrington that the matter be laid over till next session. Carried on division of 8 to 3 nays.

Moved by Mr. Wright, seconded by Mr. Henry that the chairman and secretary be instructed to present the estimates to the town and county councils. Carried.

Accounts from J. G. Fennell amounting to $8.21 were presented and referred to committees with power to act.

Board adjourned.

THE ROB

A CROW BLACKBIRD.

FACTS WHICH FARMERS SHOULD ALWAYS BEAR IN MIND.

Insect-Eating Birds and Their Value to the Agriculturist—A Mass of Testimony in Their Favor—The Honor Roll Call of the Birds.

Probably few farmers have any idea of the assistance which they receive from friends who ask no reward, except now and then a little fruit, or a few seeds of grain. A recent number of The National Stockman gives a mass of testimony as to the noble work done by the birds in the destruction of grasshoppers and other insects. The experiments were made by Prof. Aughey, of the University of Nebraska. Tabulated results show conclusively that birds of all kinds were doing their best to reduce the number of locusts. The birds of the thrush family were examined first. The stomachs of six robins contained the remains of 265 locusts; three wood thrushes had 68 locusts; one hermit thrush contained 19 locusts; two olive backed thrushes had gathered in 55 locusts; two Wilson's thrushes absorbed 73 of the pests, while five cat birds had "called" 152 of the insects. Three blue birds yielded 677 of the "hoppers," and one little ruby crowned kinglet showed up 29 as the result of its industry. But four tufted titmice contained no less than 250 specimens, and nine long-tailed chickadees had secured by hard work 481 of these enemies of agriculture. Four slender-billed nuthatches had the remains of 93 locusts. But the little warblers also insisted in "taking a hand" in the general massacre, for seven golden warblers turned in 77 locusts and 176 other insects. Five black-throated green warblers had secured 116 of the hoppers and 104 other insects. Four black poll warblers gathered 123 locusts and 47 other insects. Eight prairie warblers showed the remains of 116 locusts and a still larger number of other insects. Seven barn swallows called in 139 locusts; eight cave swallows exhibited 326 of the pests; five bank swallows contained 104, and ten purple martins had sacrificed 265 of these insects. Many of these birds were seen to feed the inmates of their nests with young locusts.

But the roll call does not stop here, even if our space should; and we would gladly give the complete record—for the roll of honor includes the yellow-headed blackbird, the vireas, shrikes, the bobolinks, Baltimore orioles, Brewer's blackbirds, purple grackle and others which ate locusts almost without limit. Not only these birds did their full duty, but even the ravens, the crows, the magpies and the bluejays followed up the good work and consumed vast numbers of the pests. The flycatchers and pewees were not far behind, while 348 "hoppers" were taken from the stomachs of seven night hawks. The humming birds are generally regarded as simply ornamental, but Prof. Aughey states that his cat caught a specimen of the ruby-throated humming bird, whose stomach contained the bodies of four locusts. Ten specimens of the yellow-billed cuckoos yielded 416 locusts and 152 other insects. But the woodpeckers were evidently bent on business, and did not confine themselves to a single article of diet, for 29 woodpeckers contained 853 locusts and 725 insects of various sorts. Even the birds of prey seemed to have joined in the good work, for 18 owls examined displayed the remains of almost 600 locusts and other insects. Not to be outdone by the owls, the two hawks which were taken gave up 378 locusts. In the same line followed the wild turkeys, grouse, prairie hens and quail. Emulating the above good examples, a large variety of shore birds did almost equally good work, considering that their natural food is largely found in the water.

In view of the above, can any farmer have a shadow of doubt as to the inestimable value of the birds as aids in protecting his crops. If a few birds furnished such results for a single day's work, what would be the result were a calculation to be made of the work of all the birds for an entire season? All sorts of birds were examined, from the pelican, with its mammoth form, to the gem-like humming bird, and all proved to be the friends of the farmer in protecting his crops from the ruthless invader. How foolish is he who allows these his allies to be hunted as if they were robbers and enemies, and especially where he allows them to be slaughtered for no good purpose. Would space permit we could refer to hundreds of cases, in many of which the evidence is even stronger than any given above, and all of such unquestioned truthfulness as to leave no doubt as to the facts in the matter. A word to the wise is sufficient.

Can We Economize in Feeding?

It is being demonstrated over and over that by the economical feeding of a cow is not attained the "economical"—withholding—process, but full feeding of the best to promote the largest milk yield, the economy being found along the line of cheaper production of the food, and in combinations which afford nature a better source of nutrients. To this end the world has been searched to get cheap proteins and supply the cow with the 2 1-2 pounds daily which she must have to carry out in full the demands made upon her system in the time of milk giving. Do not hesitate to purchase the proteins. The carbo-hydrates, 4-5 of the ration, can be cheaply grown on the farm in the form of corn and its fodder, hay and like crops; and the proteins can be supplied to some extent in clover, but so long as 80 per cent.—approximately—of the protein in bran, oilmeal and like foods, is returned to the fertility supply, there is no reason why these cannot be purchased and prove to be one of the most economic parts of the ration.

Another feature of the matter is that crops like corn, potatoes and oats—all starch crops—can be raised and exchanged often direct for proteins like bran or oilmeal. For the past three or four years at the writer's station, a ton of oats and their grinding would procure 1 1-2 tons of best fine bran, which was a big boot for the farmer, being in every way as good or better for milk than the oats, and made the half over, a clear gain. The 200 bushels per acre as 20 cents even would purchase over 4 tons of bran, and this would become a cheaper source of nitrogen, or rather protein, than could possibly be secured on the farm acre. Taking it all in all, when it comes to be demonstrated exactly, I hazard the opinion that if the resulting manure is carefully handled and applied to the land with as little loss as may be, the proteins needed for the cows can be purchased cheaper than they can be grown in the clover. On the other hand, clover is never to be overlooked as one of the great crops in the economies of farming. Its weak point is its uncertainty on the average farm, but bran and oil meal well fed, and cared for as a feed residue, will soon put the farm into a condition where the clover will grow with a reasonable assurance of success, and, fed with the purchased proteins, it will soon solve the question of economy in feeding the cows. —John Gould, in Country Gentleman.

Timely Notes for Beekeepers — Honey Facts in Small Volume.

Clip the queen's wings when the swarm is hived.

Shade the hives when the weather is warm.

Basswood is the greatest honey-producer while in bloom.

Put starters of thin foundation in the section boxes.

Remove all frames filled with brood from the brood chamber.

Strong colonies at the proper time insure a good honey harvest.

Where the honey is extracted a large number of extra combs are necessary.

A little pine tar smeared on a board will drive ants from the hive.

Put the honey in the driest, warmest room about the house.

Honey properly kept will improve. The longer it is kept the better it will be.

If exposed to cold or dampness honey will granulate in the cells.

A weak solution of carbolic acid and salt is a good remedy for bee stings.

Look out for robbers when the harvest becomes scarce.

If you work for extracted honey be careful not to extract too close.

In using the smoker the judgment of the operator must determine the quantity.

When bees are building comb or raising brood they must have plenty of water.

Colonies with young queens are less liable to build drone comb than with old queens.

The only way to keep drones for any length of time is to keep them in queenless colonies.

One item in hiving a swarm successfully is to have the hive in a cool place. The bees will enter a cool hive more readily.

One of the best places to locate a hive is in the orchard, where the bees will be free from annoyance.

United bees will be more successful if the condemned queens are killed two or three days before uniting.

Well-ripened honey will not granulate as readily as that which is thin. Cold is a chief element in granulation.

After the honey season is over take away most of the honey, so that a great number of bees will not be reared.

The best stock build up early, swarm first and are much the best to gather honey.

Some claim that the homeless bee disease can be prevented by watering the bees at home, adding a little salt to the water.

A young queen will begin to deposit eggs in ten days from birth, and is credited with laying 3000 eggs daily.

The best time to introduce a queen is in the middle of the day, when the greater portion of the bees are at work.

Make it a rule to remove all boxes containing comb as soon as completed. In this way the boxes will not be soiled.

Second swarms may be controlled by taking out all queen cells but one after the first swarm issues. Plurality of queens causes second swarms.

Wheat grown in the north of France has from 11 to 26 per cent. less nitrogenous elemens in it than that raised there 50 years ago, according to a recent report made to the Academie des Sciences.

A method of precipitating zinc in aqueous solution in the shape of dense plates of commercial thickness by means of electricity has been found at the zinc works at Duisberg in Germany. The process, which is kept secret, was discovered by Prof. Dieftenbach, of Darmstadt. The economic difficulties in the problem have also been solved, as the works are turning out 90 tons of zinc a month, and are to be enlarged.

Uses of Water.

Ordinary headaches almost always yield to the simultaneous application of hot water to the feet and back of the neck.

Nothing so promptly cuts short a congestion of the lungs, sore throat or rheumatism as hot water, when applied early in the case and thoroughly.

A proper towel folded several times and dipped in hot water, quickly wrung and applied over the site of toothache or neuralgia, will generally afford prompt relief.

Hot water taken freely half an hour before bedtime is an excellent cathartic in case of constipation, while it has a soothing effect upon the stomach and bowels.

A strip of flannel, or a soft napkin, folded lengthwise and dipped in hot water and wrung out, and then applied around the neck of a child that has the croup, will usually bring relief in a few minutes.—Pharmological Journal.

THE BREAKING WAVES.

Cool sea waves, whose rhythm deep
An unending chant is telling,
Swelling, welling,
Where the restless, seething surges leap;
Shorewards on thy fleet steeds riding,
Gliding, hiding,
As a wounded bird to die doth creep.

Of thy will came ye ashore,
Ocean's placid bosom leaving,
Heaving, cleaving,
To slow currents that round green isles bore;
Waving rockweed at thy pleasure,
Treasure, measure,
Of thy halcyon balmy days of yore.

Moments since thy fellows tost,
Where new waves like rare flowers blowing,
Flowing, glowing,
With fine filaments of spray were crost;
Then upon the steep beach hurling,
Curling, purling,
And anon in shingly sands were lost.

O ye waves that ever roll,
With life's vigor all unrested,
Crested, vested,
With a message for my sentient soul!
Time's swift waves to waves succeeding,
Pleading, heeding,
I may reach my cherished goal!

SOME EXPERT TREE CLIMBING.

How the Native of the East Walks Up the Trunk.

If tree climbing, as some learned professors will have it, is a legacy from our arboreal ancestors, the natives of the East have got their share in a wonderfully intact condition. Of course, there are lazy natives, who keep monkeys to save them the bother of climbing cocoanut palms for dinner, but the best of monkeys fight shy of a wild bee's nest, however well stocked it may be with honey. The monkey likes the honey well enough, but fears the bee, and so leaves this business to his master. The jungle bee, too, has the habit of selecting the very top of the highest branches tree it can find for its nest. That is no great object to the professional honey-gathering jungleman. The jungleman, throwing his mantle over his shoulders, encircles the bole of the tree and his body in a loose loop of rattan. Then, leaning back in the loop and planting his feet against the tree, he practically walks up the side of the tree, supporting his weight in the loop as he scales upward. Reaching the nest, he deftly envelopes it in his mantle and quickly returns to the ground, commonly without a sting, and with a stone or two of honey for his pains.—London Sketch.

After waiting 1900 years the town of Venosa, the ancient Venusium, where Horace was born, has decided to erect a monument to his memory.

Mark Twain, who is now in London, is about to publish a volume of essays under the title of one of them, "How to Tell a Story." It will include the "Defense of Harriet Shelley," which appeared in one of the monthlies not long ago.

Mr. Kipling is quoted as having said recently that he counts the long novel the essential thing for a writer of fiction. "Independent firing by marksmen is a pretty good thing, but it is the volley-firing of a full battalion that clears the front," he says in support of his claim.

Richard Le Gallinne was married the other day, and such a move on his part was received with much surprise by his friends. Ever since the death of his first wife he had carried out the peculiar custom of calling the attention of his friends by little notes of the anniversary of her death and dilating on the distress which the sad event still gave him.

CAMP LE NID.

Camp Le Nid never opened under more auspicious circumstances than this year. On Saturday, the 17th inst., the first instalment left Napanee per steam yacht Jessie Forward. The party was composed of C. J. T. Gould, Sidney Morgan, C. W. Hurst, Jas. Ingram and L. B. Furnell, of Baltimore; I. D. Ward, of Toronto; Melrose Gould, of Oshawa; Morley Wilson and W. S. Herrington, of Napanee.

After a pleasant sail down the river and bay we arrived at Ruttan's Point at 5 p.m., and before dark had our tents pitched and our baggage under shelter. Our first interest was to ascertain the extent of our loss through the depredations committed by some sneak thieves who laid unholy hands who laid unholy hands upon our belongings last spring. Thanks to Mr. Ruttan, who kept a careful guard upon our dining hall and removed the goods likely to be stolen when he discovered our locks had been broken, our loss was limited to bedding and clothing, principally the property of the Baltimore members.

The subsequent arrivals are W. G. McClelland, S. E. Cork, and Jas. Milo, of Toronto; J. W. McElroy, Ottawa; L. Winchester, of Baltimore; and F. T. Bryers, of Montreal.

We are now comfortably settled and in full enjoyment of all the luxuries and comforts that camp life can afford. The Golf links, as usual, are the main source of attraction for the sporting members of camp. The Island furnishes ample opportunities for our ladies' men, while the camp itself gives ease and relaxation to all who revel in cool breezes and the companionship of old friends.

The Camp Glee Club was never so full before and the nightly concerts under our favorite old oak tree are a source of great enjoyment.

The bass fishing is not good but there appears to be no end to the number of small fish that can be caught.

Glen Island was never so popular as this year. Mr. Dingman is kept busy in finding accomodation for his guests.

A Euchre Club has been organized at the Island. We are laying low for a challenge.

Fifteen more arrivals are expected in Camp before August 1st.

The water is a foot higher than last year. The bathing from our dock is delightful.

Le Nid pins are in demand.

A Wonderful Operation.

"I suppose I performed the greatest surgical operation of the age," remarked the youngest doctor in the crowd that had been swapping experiences. "I was taking a run through British Columbia on my bicycle, when I was asked to attend a young Indian whose stomach had been pierced by a rival's knife. I had no surgical appliances, but I fixed up the cut so that the fellow was around the next day and is strong and healthy now."

"How did you do it?" asked all in a breath.

"Well, the Indians had slaughtered a beef that day. I picked out a nice, thin piece of tripe, tied a string to it, covered it with tire cement, shoved it through the wound, and pulled it into place just as if I were mending a puncture in my tire. It was the greatest—"

"Poor papa," she said, "is feeling wretchedly."

"Indeed?" he returned, becoming suddenly interested.

"Oh, yes," she explained. "He's all used up. I don't know what is the matter with him, but I think it must be an aggravated attack of spring fever. He has hardly enough energy to move."

The young man roused himself.

"Perhaps," he said, "this would be a good time for me to—er—speak to him about our—ah—engagement."

She rather regretted that she had to lie to him in this way to give him courage, but she could not forget that all is fair in love and war.—Chicago Post.

A Good Many Rods to the Mile.

Smith—How did you like traveling on the P.D.S. Railroad? Rather crooked, wasn't it?

Brown—Crooked! I should say it was. Why, say, it is an actual fact that in less than one hour one day my train passed the same barn at least half a dozen times. But that wasn't the straggest incident, however. You may not believe it, but about every ten miles the engineer would lean out of his cab and reach into some of the windows in the rear cars and beg a chew of tobacco.

"Let me see," said one old friend of another, returning to town after an absence of several years; "you were in love with that Coldslaw girl, once, weren't you?"

"Yes, indeed," replied his friend, with a chuckle.

"Until we got married."—Yonkers Statesman.

MR. and Mrs. Gladstone on Sunday last celebrated the fifty-eighth anniversary of their wedding. Many visitors joined in the family rejoicings at Harwarden, and scores of the townspeople saluted the venerable couple while on their way to church. Both are in excellent health, Mr. Gladstone walking off with as much vigor as at any time within the past ten years, shaking hands energetically and conversing with great animation.

THE number of business failures which are reported from day to day through the press, is alarming. With the failure of the John Eaton Company of Toronto comes the reported failure of another firm in that city, Bachrack & Co. The writ was issued by a wholesale house in that city for $518. Steps should be taken at once by the Department of Justice in this matter. Merchants buy goods from wholesale houses on credit, customers must pay one hundred cents on the dollar the goods which, which are sold at a good margin. If a business house makes an assignment they pay their creditors a rate on the dollar, anything from thirty cents to seventy five cents The customer and wholesale house suffer. This is not justice.

MAYOR Harrison, of Chicago, has signed the ordinance which will place a tax on vehicles and bicycles in that city. The tax on bicycles will be $1 and $2 on a one horse vehicle. We would suggest that part of this plan be adopted in Canada. We do not advocate the taxing of vehicles, but as to the taxing of bicycles we are in favor. This idea will doubtless not meet with general approval but when we consider the benefits to be derived, we support the scheme. The tax is not heavy and with the large number of wheels in use a revenue could be raised which would help in large

ALL NATIONS GAMES.

THOSE OF THE PRESENT SURVIVALS OF DIVINITARY RITES.

Even Indians Had Their Layouts Before the Discovery of America—And Poker, With Very Slight Differences, Was Played in Paris.

Mr. Stewart Culin, director of the Museum of Archaeology and Paleontology of the University of Pennsylvania, whose advance articles on the work he is compiling on the games of the world has attracted so much attention, has been spending a few days at the National Museum in pursuit of his studies. For the past eight years Director Culin has been collecting data and specimens of the games which are played by all the nations of the world, and has also made as complete collection as possible of specimens extant of the games played by the most ancient people.

"Games generally," said Mr. Culin, "are remarkable for their similarity, which extends practically to identity, in all parts of the earth, in all times and among people of the highest and the lowest culture. Any inferences in reference to the contact of races and migrations must be made with extreme caution, as we find pretty much the same games everywhere. The games of amusement played at the present day by civilized people are clearly survivals of divinitary rites, this fact being shown by the position which all games occupy among the people whom we call savages. The more complicated games, such as playing cards, appear to have direct relations with the divinitary calendar. And the counting boards or cables, upon which pieces of wood are moved, as in backgammon or chess, have similar relations.

"The collection shown at Atlanta, while occupying a great deal of space and apparently diversified in character, merely represented an attempt to illustrate the development of two types of games which are represented to-day by playing cards and chess. In the course of these investigations it is shown that in a sense playing cards in one form or another are practically universal, and were known to many of the tribes of this continent antedating the discovery. Their most highly artistic form occurs in the 'gambling sticks' of the Indians of our Northwest coast. These gambling sticks, it is demonstrated, were derived from arrow shaftments marked with the emblems of place and personality.

"The cards of northeast Asia, such as are used in Korea, reveal precisely the same origin as those arrow shaftments. Chinese cards connect with them, and our own cards may be regarded as the legitimate issues of the same series."

Incidentally in the collection a number of highly artistic packs of playing cards are exhibited, intended to illustrate the ancient and existing cards of the principal nations. A Persian set among the Oriental cards is of strikingly artistic beauty. The card pieces are painted with delicate miniatures, executed upon a ground of gold foil. Curious enough, the game played with them is our familiar game of poker.

Gen. A. Houtum-Schindler of Teheran, in reply to a letter of inquiry, has furnished the following account of the Persian game: The game is called "As," and is exactly like poker, but without any flushes or sequences. There are four players and each player gets five cards, dealt to the right. The dealer puts down a stake. The first player then looks at his cards; if he "goes" he says "di dam" (I have seen), and covers the stake or raises it. If he does not wish to play he says "Nadi dam" (I have not seen), and throws down his cards.

He may also "go" without looking at his cards, that is, in poker parlance, "straddle," and he says "nadid di dam" (not seeing I have seen). The second player, if he wishes to play, must cover the stakes and can also raise. The third player and the dealer then act in the same way, just as in poker, and when the stakes of all players are equal and no one raises any more, the cards are turned up and the player holding the best hand wins the stakes. The hands in the order of their value are taree of a kind and a pair, a "full," three, ace, king, etc.; two pair, aces highest; one pair, aces highest. When two players have the same pair of pairs, the other cards decide. For instance, a pair of kings, ace, soldier and some card of little value. Bluffing is a feature of the game, and is called zadam, literally, "Fire off a gun."

Backgammon is one of the few classical games to which the present day attains. It is extremely interesting from the fact that it is identical with the Roman gaming, dice being cast from a dice box into a little tower, the Turicula of the classical writers. In the museum a backgammon board is shown from the Malay Peninsula, which is used in a game identical with our own.

FOR GERMAN TASTES.

TOOTHSOME DISHES FOR PEOPLE WHO EAT FIVE MEALS A DAY.

Some Cooking Lessons to Be Learned From Them—How to Prepare Their Dainties — Delicious Things For an Extra Evening Meal.

German cooking has some marked characteristics. It is not quite like the cooking of any other nationality. To many persons not born Germans, most of it is an acquired taste, but some of it is found delicious by everyone, even without previous acquaintance.

To enjoy all the German dishes, however, one must observe the German custom as to the hours for the different meals. This custom is much too leisurely for our country. There is no leisure here, and this is one of the things about which foreigners complain when they visit here. The English and Germans find time for two more meals than are usual in this country.

Germans, in coming to America, preserve as far as possible the customs of the Fatherland. It is not possible, however, to eat five meals a day when the head of the house must travel two or three miles each morning to business, instead of being at or very near home, as he generally is in Germany. There he will have coffee and rolls for the real breakfast; a more elaborate meal at 9 or 10; dinner at 1 or 2; "Vesperbrod" at 5, and a cold supper at 7. The Vesperbrod is the one extra meal which obtains in America, says The New York Times. That is a possibility, and with the German coffee cake, apple cake, and "Kranzkuchen" and coffee, is a very agreeable exchange for afternoon tea for anyone who may be invited to share it, and has not had the experience before.

Vesperbrod is not served as if afternoon tea. It is an informal meal, but the family and such friends as may be present gather in the parlor or sitting room, where a table is drawn up to the sofa. It is served in this country as nearly as possible in the German manner. The table is regularly set, and the coffee should be made in the German coffee machine. This is used with an alcohol lamp. The ground coffee is put into a round strainer, which is covered with another strainer, both being on top of a small cylinder, and may be seen through the glass sides of the machine as it bubbles up and fills gradually the outer part of the machine with a clear, deep, richly-colored liquid ready to pour into the cups.

The coffee cake, the homemade article, made in small quantities, is the most satisfactory. This is the way it is made in the house of a German family, and it is delicious if made with judgment. The maker in this family is one of those experienced cooks whose recipes may be difficult to follow, for her judgment has become so exact through long experience that she relies upon it rather than use the measuring cups and scales.

German Coffee Cakes.

To make good coffee cakes in the German style, take two pounds of flour, a pint and a half of milk, three eggs, a quarter of a pound of butter. Set a sponge with one pint of milk warmed, flour to make a stiff batter, and one cake of compressed yeast. When it has risen sufficiently add the other ingredients, the butter being worked into the flour, then knead well. The cake should be rolled, or better, pressed out with the fingers very thin for baking. When in the pan, brush over with melted butter, and on top place chopped almonds, cinnamon, and sugar. Bake in a moderate oven. The cake may be sweetened to taste. The greater part of the sweetness should be on the top.

Apple cake and Kranzkuchen are made in the same way. For the apple cake, apples are cut according to size into halves or eighths, and laid over the dough, pulled out very thin, and brushed over with melted butter. There should be sugar and cinnamon on the apples, and also a few currants. When the

English Informality

I have known American guests arrive at an English house in the afternoon when host and hostess and all the guests were out shooting or driving. The arriving Americans thought they were being treated ceremoniously, and were disposed to resent it. I asked them whether they really thought that the day's plans for a score of guests ought to have been upset in order that the host should meet them at his front door as they drove up. That was a new point of view to them. And I finally pacified them by relating what had befallen me early in my English experiences, which I will repeat here. An English friend, whom I met by chance in London on Friday, asked me to come to his house in the country from Saturday to Monday. I was engaged Saturday evening, and arranged to come Sunday morning instead. Arriving at 11 o'clock, I was shown into the drawing-room, where sat a lady whom I had never seen, but whom I guessed to be my friend's wife. Of him there was no sign. We talked for a while, then went out for a walk. My host came in just before luncheon, one or two other guests with him. This lady told me long afterwards that she no more knew me than I her; that her husband had told her a man was coming down that morning, but did not say who, and she took for granted it was some one she knew; that when the servant announced me she did not hear the name, and that it was thus we spent the morning together, neither sure of the other's identity. It was the beginning of a long friendship. It is also a very good illustration of the easy way in which formalities are dispensed with in an English country house.—Harper's Weekly.

British Finances.

The expenses of Great Britain are now about $500,000,000 yearly, or nearly $1000 per minute, but every tick of the clock represents an inflow of a little over $16 into the British Treasury, thus leaving an anual surplus of about $20,000,000.

be sugar and cinnamon on the apples, and also a few currants. When the apple cake is taken from the oven it is sprinkled with water with a brush to make it moist. This sprinkling must not be omitted or the quality of the cake will suffer. It is done "according to judgment."

The ring, Kranzkuchen, and pretzel, also, if made in a double ring, like the pretzel so familiar as an accompaniment to beer, are all made of the coffee-cake dough. The dough is, as before, brushed over with melted butter, and upon the thin cake sugar, cinnamon, chopped almonds, currants and raisins are laid. The whole is rolled as a jelly cake, and then formed into a ring, Kranz, or double ring, pretzel, as desired, and also baked in a moderate oven. When this is done the thin frosting of the white of an egg and sugar is spread over it, and the result is a very delicious cake, which is eaten with an excellent cup of coffee.

Potato Pudding and Wine Sauce.

For a potato pudding for a family of six persons, take six large potatoes and boil them in the skins, but not too soft. Peel and let stand until the following day. Grate them, taking for the soup only the finer part that falls behind the grater. Take also six tablespoonfuls of cracker flour, the juice of two lemons, with the rind of one, six eggs and six tablespoonfuls of sugar. The yolks of the eggs should be well beaten and stirred into the other ingredients, and the whites of the eggs, beaten to a stiff broth, added last, being stirred in lightly. Put into a pudding, mold and boil for two hours. It should then be taken from the water, the cover of the pan removed, and set in the oven for ten or fifteen minutes. Serve with fruit or wine sauce.

To make wine sauce, take one cup milk, small cup sugar, yolks of two eggs. Cook as soft custard and add before serving a wineglass of wine.

Rote grutze is a pretty dish, which is a great favorite in Northern Germany, and is eaten at any and all times during the day and all through the warm weather. It is simply made. Boil equal quantities of red raspberries and red currants sufficiently to extract the juice. Add to the strained juice an equal quantity of sugar. Stiffen with corn starch, two tablespoonfuls being sufficient for a pint. Mold and eat cold with cream. It is very delicate and delicious.

Some Fatherland Soups.

German soups are delicious, and many of them are eaten cold during warm weather. Potato soup is a favorite. It is made with stock, and not with milk, as the soup generally served as potato soup is. A number of vegetables are used. There are few that would be amiss. Take a little cabbage, a medium-sized carrot, a small turnip, a medium-sized leek, a small stalk of celery, one large onion, and some parsley root; chop all together and put on to cook in a spoonful of good drippings until tender. Then add the stock, or water will do. Thicken with a large spoonful of flour and cut into the soup about eight medium-sized potatoes that have been peeled. Cook all together until the vegetables are falling to pieces. Strain the soup, which should have been seasoned with salt and pepper, through a colander, and before serving add a tablespoonful of sour cream.

Bread soup is also a great favorite. It is a sweet soup. Take stale crusts of rye bread and put them on to boil in water. When soft, strain and put the liquid back over the fire with a piece of butter, a small quantity of dried currants, a small half cup of sugar, or sweeten to taste—and it should be quite sweet—and add a little salt. A little vinegar can be added if desired. Judgment has to be used in the amount of water and bread. The amount of sugar given is that which would be used in a soup for six persons. The soup should be of some substance, though by no means of the thickness of porridge. It is eaten cold in summer.

In making farina soup no butter is used, but to the salted water should be added sufficient farina to make it almost of the consistency of cream. Beat the whites of two eggs to a stiff froth with a little sugar and add to the soup, add the beaten yolks just before serving, if served hot. To do this, add to them a little cold water, then from the soup kettle add gradually a little of the hot soup until the dish in which the eggs have been beaten is filled. There will be then no danger in adding the mixture to the soup in the kettle.

Einluf is an unfamillar variety of soup. Make a batter like pancake batter, with two eggs, two heaping teaspoonfuls of flour and water, or milk. Have sufficient water to make a soup for six persons, and when it boils let the batter run into it smoothly. It is well to reserve the yolk of one egg to add to the soup last with a little sugar and a piece of butter. The soup can be eaten cold, and some persons prefer it without sugar.

caterer for German tastes. To make a dessert of it, let the milk stand until it is thick, and just before serving stir it thoroughly or serve it stiff, some people prefer it so. Prepare to serve with it grated rye bread that is a day or two old, and sugar which has been seasoned with cinnamon. The grated rye bread and the sugar are each in separate dishes, to be taken by each individual in any proportion they like.

Another good dessert is a lemon pudding. Mix together the yolks of eight eggs, eight heaping tablespoonfuls of sugar, two heaping tablespoonfuls of flour, the rind of one lemon and the juice of two. Stir the whites of the eggs, beaten to a stiff froth, into the mixture, and bake in a buttered pudding pan for half an hour and serve with wine sauce. Great care must be taken that the pudding does not fall. If it is put into the oven about the time the soup is served on the table, it will be ready and just right to serve for dessert.

Wind-Beutel Breakfast Cake.

Wind-Beutel is a light breakfast cake, which requires care in making and baking. It may also be eaten cold at any time.

Take a quart of milk and a pinch of flour, with a pinch of salt. With a part of the milk make a thick, smooth batter. Take four eggs, adding one at a time, beating thoroughly the whole mixture. Add last the remainder of the milk, stir in well, and bake in small, well-buttered tins. If the cakes show the slightest tendency to fall when being taken from the oven, they should be returned for a few minutes' longer baking.

Legs Lost in Battle.

"I can tell almost to a certainty to which branch of the service he belonged when I see an old soldier stalking around on one leg," said Colonel Lamar Fontaine of Mississippi, the famous Confederate scout and poet, who was at the Laclede yesterday. "If the left leg is missing, then I am pretty certain he belonged to the infantry, and if he is minus the right leg, then I feel safe in betting that he was a cavalryman. In either case the absence of the leg proves more conclusively than the written record that the man who lost it was fighting like a soldier when wounded.

HELPLESS FOR A YEAR.

Bowed Down With Rheumatism and Sciatica.

From the Post, Sackville, N.B.

Records like the following carry conviction with them, and in a practical sense it might be said that this is still the age of miracles. Mr. Edward Downey, of Maccan, N.B., says:—"I have been a resident of Cumberland Co. some years. I have been a great sufferer for upwards of ten years with sciatic rheumatism. I was tortured with severe pains which at times would become almost everything a man can suffer and live. I was so crippled that I could not work and part of the time was not able to even move about. I became so weak, and my system so run down that I despaired of ever getting better. My case was an almost hopeless one, and as I had abandoned work I was almost helpless for over a year. I heard of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills and I was induced to at least give them a trial. In a short time I began to recover, and the agonizing pains left my back and limbs, so that I was enabled to walk out of doors. Before I had used more than half a dozen boxes I was almost entirely well and could do a hard day's work. I had a good appetite and began to gain flesh and feel like a man. I am free from aches and pains and have Dr. Williams' Pink Pills to thank for it all." The reporter could not help feeling that Mr. Downey's case was a striking one, as he now presents a stout well built figure, straight limbed and as smart in his movements as a young man of twenty.

The Way to Teach

MAN'S ANIMAL FOES.

TWENTY VARIETIES SUPPOSED TO BE HOSTILE TO HUMAN BEINGS.

A Novel Department of a United States Government Year Book The Working of the Bounty System in the Neighboring Republic.

In the forthcoming year book, to be published three months hence, says The Washington Post, the Department of Agriculture will offer a novel contribution to natural history. The topic will be: "Animals Supposed to Be Foes of Mankind," and it will tell about the mammals and birds native to this country which are supposed to be hostile to human beings and their industries.

It cannot be said that in the United States bounties have brought about the extermination of a single species of animal in any State. The rarity of wolves east of the Mississippi River is rather due to the settlement of the country than to the number killed for rewards. On the great plains, where civilization has not encroached upon nature's domain to any great extent, the wolves have not decreased perceptibly, notwithstanding high premiums paid for scalps. Almost undoubtedly coyotes, which are a small breed of wolves, have increased in California during the last three years since the bounty on them was withdrawn, so that there are now as many of them in that State as ever. California, Montana and Texas offered $5 apiece for coyote scalps for some time, the outlay aggregating hundreds of thousands of dollars; but the results were unimportant. Iowa and Minnesota are the only Western States which now pay more than $3 per wolf scalp, and in Iowa the rate for young wolves is $2.

Meanwhile in some parts of the country wolves and coyotes are very destructive. In New Mexico they kill from $150,000 to $300,000 worth of sheep annually, and in Nebraska the damage done to sheep is reckoned at $100,000 a year. One difficulty in the wolf problem lies in the fact that it is impossible to secure the co-operation of all the States. This lack of agreement on the subject of bounties in general opens a wide door to fraud. Scalps taken in localities where rewards are low are shipped to places where premiums are high, and thus it often happens that a county is compelled to pay for animals that did not belong to it. At the present time the bounty on wolves and coyotes varies from $1.50 $5.00, the latter price being paid in the Black Hill regions of South Dakota. In North Dakota it is $2; it is $3 in Montana and Wyoming, and in Iowa it is $5, except for young animals. Thus rewards may be claimed profitably in Iowa for coyotes killed in North Dakota.

The wolf bounty in Nevada was 50 cents when California was offering $5 for scalps. Consequently, thousands of scalps were shipped from Nevada to California, and large numbers of them were actually imported from Mexico, so that California found herself getting Midsummer Danger.

Paine's Celery Compound Surely and Quickly Cures Neurasthenia.

One of the commonest and most dangerous diseases of midsummer is Neurasthenia, or Nervous Prostration. This disease, which respects neither age nor sex, is usually brought on by overwork and worry in the shop, office, home and school.

It is maintained by physicians of large experience that nervous diseases are increasing so fast that to-day few people can boast of perfect freedom from nervous ailments.

The symptoms of nervous exhaustion are so well known that it is almost unnecessary to name them. Dizziness, sleeplessness, palpitation of the heart, shooting pains in the limbs, paralytic symptoms, constipation and headache are the commonest feeders of the disease.

One of the first indications of nervous disease is irritability, then ensues despondency, often followed by terrible insanity.

Past experience and medical testimony answer the question fully. Paine's Celery Compound is the only medicine that can surely overcome the troubles of the nerves. This marvellous curing medicine braces up every nerve, gives strength to the muscles and tissues, makes pure, rich blood, gives perfect digestion and sweet, sound sleep.

In this age of overwork, worry and fast living, Paine's Celery Compound is a shield and protector against the ravages of all nervous ailments. Medical men and druggists having a full knowledge of the virtues of Paine's Celery Compound are recommending it every day.

Its cures attest its superiority and usefulness; its work in public institutions has given it a popularity never possessed by any other medicine. Try it, nervous one; it will quickly give you that condition of health that you are looking for.

Midsummer Care of Roses.

In many amateur gardens the rose bushes are, after the blooming season of May and early June, left to shift for themselves. If the soil is moderately rich they start new growth along the old wood or send up shoots from the root which push their way in any direction among the tangle of spent stems and branches. Various insects attack them—especially the perforating rose slug, so recently domesticated among us, the leaves ecome yelow and brown with leaf-spot disease and long before autumn they have ceased to grow and present the appearance of vegetable wrecks.

proves more conclusively than the written record that the man who lost it was fighting like a soldier when wounded.

"The reason the infantryman losses the left leg in battle is this: Infantrymen are drilled to place the left foot forward when firing in order to balance the body so that steadier aim can be taken. This naturally acts as a protection to the right leg, which, of course, is more or less concealed. Consequently, the bullet of the enemy is much more apt to find lodgement in the left leg than the right. Now, the cavalryman uses a pistol nearly altogether. It is handier and less cumbersome. The pistol is held in the right hand, and this causes the cavalryman when firing to place his right foot forward for support. In this way that side of him is much more likely to suffer than the left. But, as I said, either case is conclusive evidence to me that the soldiers thus maimed were facing the enemy when shot. The loss of the leg indicates almost to a certainty that the sufferer was standing in military position and not crouching or running.—Atlanta Constitution.

The Way to Teach.

Any method which is productive of lasting and beneficial results is a good method. "Reasoning," says Locke, "is the faculty of deducing unknown truths from principles already familiar."

The principal difficulty with teachers to-day is the same as Horace Mann pointed out years ago, "We do too much telling and too little teaching." Prof. Dewey says of present-day methods. "They succeed in crushing out all spontaneous interest in the subject itself, even if they do not all but destroy a capacity for it."

It is this spontaneous interest that must be awakened and kept alive. The teacher must be "spontaneous," enthusiastic, very much alive. Such a teacher never uses a textbook during a recitation; is ready and apt in his illustrations; pleasing in manner of presentation; able to present the same thing in different ways; never resorts to sarcasm as a means of correction, or to cover up his own lack of information; gets his class where the members are not afraid to try; sits little during recitation, possibly not at all; censures sparingly; praises much. But this kind of teaching takes time for careful preparation, and much hard work is required.—Journal of Pedagogy.

What Did Bucephalus Cost?

The Greek army recently encamped on the plain where Bucephalus was reared; but the famous Thessalian horses have now dwindled to the size of ponies, ridden by the irregulars and local levies of the Greeks. Bucephalus was the most costly war horse ever bought. The animal came out of a noted stud owned by a Thessalian chief; and even before his celebrated taming by Alexander, this gentleman asked Philip £2518 15s. as his lowest price. Pliny says that Philip gave £435 more than this. It now appears that, contrary to general belief, Bucephalus was a mare. This accounts for the high price paid. The purchaser would breed foals from the costly animal. Compared with the prices asked for Arab mares of great descent in much later times, the sum demanded is not excessive. But Bucephalus was a good bargain even as a war horse. She was ridden until she was thirty years old, and then died of wounds received in a battle with Porus, and left her bones in the Punjab.—The Spectator.

First German Book.

Brewer says the first book printed in the German language was the "Edelstein," or "Precious Stone," in 1461, by Ulrich Boner. Seven years before this, however, in 1454, Gutenberg and Faust printed in Latin an indulgence issued by Pope Nicholas V., to Paulinus Chappe, an ambassador of the King of Cyprus. There is much conflict among the authorities as to the dates of the earlier copies of the Faust and Gutenberg books and in many cases the exact time of their issuance is conjectural.

Warming Up.

Two ancient citizens were discussing the chilly characteristics of the late month of May. A number of young men stood about them in the hotel lobby and listened.

"Why," said one, "this has been the most remarkable May I can remember since—let me see, when was it?"

"Along in the '60s, wasn't it?" said the other.

"No, it was early in the '70s."

"I don't remember any cold May in the '70s."

"Well, there was one just the same."

"You're thinking of the '60s."

"No, I'm not. I said the '70s."

"Well, there wasn't any cold May in either the '60s or the '70s."

"Then the coldest May I can remember."

"No; I remember that May very well. It wasn't a cold one by any means."

"It was colder than anything in the '60s or '70s."

"I say it wasn't. I've got the whole thing down in my scrapbook."

"Well, you'd better go home and refresh your memory."

"My memory is all right. Pity you've lost yours."

"You're a doddering old imbecile!"

"You're a superannuated old hulk!"

"That's right, gentlemen," chirruped a younger man, "keep right at it. The thermometer has already gone up several degrees!"

But they both breathed hard and walked away glaring.—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

MISS ANNA CHAPMAN.

California, and large numbers of them were actually imported from Mexico, so that California found herself getting poorer at a distressing rate, and the bounty law was repealed. Owing to ignorance of natural history on the part of local authorities, heads of domestic fowls, partridges, pheasants, cuckoos, butcher birds, etc., were accepted and paid for as those of hawks and owls under the "scalp act" in Pennsylvania. The skins of dogs and other domestic animals are frequently turned in for those of wolves and coyotes. In the case of small animals the heads are sometimes accepted in one county and the tails in another county, so that the premiums are collected twice. One county in North Dakota, waging war on ground squirrels, first required the head then the tail, and a year or two later all four feet.

One interesting effect of the bounty system is to encourage the breeding of the animals outlawed. It is said that in India many natives are regularly engaged in the business of propagating snakes for the sake of the premiums offered by the government for venomous serpents. There is no doubt that the same thing has been done in this country with various animals for which bounties were granted. For example, the eggs of hawks and owls have been taken from the nests and hatched under hens. In Iowa a few years ago it was said to be more profitable to rear coyotes for the bounty than to raise sheep, and Kentucky and New Mexico have recognized the possibility of breeding wolves by requiring affidavits showing that the animals had not been raised for the sake of the rewards. British Columbia, by the way, pays bounties for wolves, coyotes and panthers, but requires that the skulls shall be presented to the curator of the provincial museum for scientific identification.

The pocket gopher is one of the worst enemies man has to encounter in the animal kingdom. It does all its work under ground, the lines of its tunnels being marked by dead and dying plants. Its burrow runs a foot or less below the surface, and is dug for the purpose of getting at the roots on which it feeds. One may travel for weeks in a region infested by gophers, and yet not see one of them; they labor and destroy unobserved. The buffalo in their past abundance were not one-tenth so numerous. Gophers do not disappear before man, but remain in the cultivated fields, making havoc among the crops and killing the orchards. The little beast is very brave, not hesitating to attack a man on slight provocation. When young it looks strikingly like a baby, being hairless and pink, with a round head, and fat hands. It runs backward as rapidly as forward through its tunnels, and its equipment of teeth is so admirable that it is able to make 13,200 cuts a minute.

The Hindoo Funeral.

When a Hindoo dies the service of an undertaker are not needed, as word is immediately sent to the relatives and friends of the deceased, who meet at the house and attend to all the details of the funeral. Some of them buy at the bazaar the articles necessary for the ceremony, such as a piece of linen, copper pots, pieces of sandalwood, one earthen pot, some "ghee," or clarified butter; rice, a few split chips of bamboo and two strong bamboo poles for the bier. In rainy weather some oil and resin to revive the flames are added to the stock of necessaries. A sacred grass, the "durbhas," and some "tulsi" leaves are spread over the bier.

It is very necessary that the son of the deceased should perform the ceremony. If he is absent at the time of the death the father or brother of the deceased or some other male member of the family may take his place. When there is no son in the family one is adopted for the purpose.

For the Parent.

Correction does much, but encouragement after censure is as the sun after a shower.

In the man whose childhood has known caresses there is always a fibre of memory that can be touched to gentle issues.

Shortness of Breath. "Since last year I have had serious heart trouble caused by malaria. Shortness of breath, smothering spells on retiring, violent palpitation, etc., often made me gasp for breath. On procuring Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills I found to my surprise and delight that they gave almost instant relief. I got healthy, restful sleep, my heart troubles disappeared, and I now feel very well and strong indeed." Mr. Hugh Moore, Ingersoll Ont., makes this statement for autumn they have ceased to grow and present the appearance of vegetable wrecks.

For the benefit of rose growers whose experience is limited, a few directions for midsummer treatment may be given: As soon as the blooming season is over all annual and hybrid perpetual varieties should be judiciously cut back and the new growth brought into shape. With the old wood many insect pests will be removed, and so it is advisable to burn the trimmings at once. If the new growth shows any leaves with numerous holes or ragged edges, syringe the plants with white hellebore tea—one even tablespoonful to a gallon of water—taking care to wet every leaf and twig. In case the leaves turn brown and begin to drop prematurely, give them a syringing with Bordeaux mixture. A heavy mulch with well-rotted stable manure or compost mixed with a large proportion of bone meal will put them in condition for strong new growth and, in the case of the hybrids, will promote the formation of buds for another period of bloom late in summer and continuing until frost.

The tea roses and kindred strains bloom most freely and perfectly, if provided with sufficient moisture during the heats of July and August, while the other varieties are resting. Watering, when done at all, should be copious, and evaporation, checked by stirring the soil of the bed to the depth of a couple of inches, making what is called a "dust blanket." To follow these methods will require but little time or toil in rose beds of ordinary size and will be followed by satisfactory growth and bloom.

Plowing Under a Green Crop.

The benefit derived by plowing under a green crop is not yet fully determined. Yet when manure is not readily obtainable it is one of the most convenient and economical ways of building up the fertility. Even when manure is plenty it can often be done to good advantage for this reason: Soil that is cropped year after year soon becomes hard and dead and lumpy. It packs so hard and so tightly around growing plants that cultivation becomes difficult. Vegetable mould or humus is the great need of most soils that are cropped continuously. Barnyard manure or commercial fertilizers do not furnish this in sufficient quantities for securing the best results, nor do they restore to the soil as much as each succeeding crop requires.

It is largely on this account that it is always advisable to plow under not only a green growth whenever a favorable opportunity occurs, but also to plow under weeds, stalks or grass, rather than to burn them. There is, of course, very little manurial value in dry weeds, stalks or grass, but the mechanical effect is always beneficial.

One of the objects in plowing under a green growth, especially of clover, is that nitrogen is thereby added to the soil. Nitrogen is one of the three essential elements of plant growth.

Growing plants contain the largest per cent. of nitrogen when they are in full bloom. At this stage they also contain the largest per cent. of humus; hence to secure the largest benefit in plowing under a green growth, it should be done when the greater part of the plants are in full bloom.

His Trouble.

The boy came into the house weeping, and his mother was naturally solicitous.

"What's the matter, Tommy?" she asked.

"The boy across the street hit me," he replied.

"Oh, well, I wouldn't cry for that," she returned. "Show that you can be a little man."

A Passage at Arms.

Recently a newspaper man who wished to interview an officer at the barracks found that his man was in bed and soundly sleeping.

"Is there no way of getting at him?" he asked.

"No," replied the sentinel, "Smart's on the retired list, too. I'm Brown."

Scene—The bar parlor of the Prince George, Brighton. Pipes and beer all round. An old salt saying:

"I've got a riddle to ask you chaps. If a 'erring and a 'alf cost three farthings, 'ow many could you buy for sixpence?"

"I say, Bill, did you say 'errings?"

"Yes, I said 'erring."

Hog Food.

It was Johnson's humor to be anti-Scottish. He objected theoretically to haggis, though he ate a good plate full of it.

"Humph!" he replied, with his mouth full, "it's very good food for hogs!"

"Then let me help you to some mair o' it," said the lady, helping him bountifully.—From What to Eat.

FOR VANITY'S SAKE.

He was a happy and gay little singer,
With lyrics of summer pent up in his throat,
He sang from the dawn to the sunset, but always
He kept for the evening his tenderest note.
Then, when the little gold stars were twinkling,
He flew to the brim of his brown, woven nest,
And twittered soft nothings, received sleepy answers,
That made a glad quiver creep into his breast.

And ruffle his fuzzy red feathers. There surely
Was never a little bird gladder than he.
No other nest with so downy a lining
Was ever more cozily moored in a tree.

The air of the forest is heavy with fragrance,
As gay-tinted flowers their petals uncurl;
But two flashing wings that God colored so brightly
Are rigid and still—for the whim of a girl.

The little brook catches its breath as it passes,
A shadow lies dark on the woods' brooding face—
A bit of God's music and sunshine gone from them—
Fettered by ribbons and meshes of lace.

A full-throated chorus, yet summer is grieving
Over the songs that will never be heard—
Locked in a small, stiffened breast. O, I wonder
What God is thinking, you poor little bird!

JIM'S CHANCE.

The sharp ringing of a bell sounded clear above the tumult of Hamilton Corner, where the busiest thoroughfares of Winchester meet. Close at hand came a lake car, and Jim Connolly, springing forward with his iron rod, shifted it around the curve into Centre street.

Jim was switchboy for the Electric Traction Company. His post was the middle of the street, where all day long he dodged teams and turned electric cars towards their various destinations.

It was late afternoon now; Jim was tired and rather lonely and as he glanced about for some acquaintance his eyes lighted on Ted Casey standing, with back to him, on the curbstone near by. A bundle of afternoon papers was tucked under Ted's arm, but he was staring idly at a fantastic poster.

The opportunity was irresistible. Jim quickly looked four ways, and seeing that the corner was now free from cars he darted over behind Ted and seized him by the collar.

"Aw, le' me be!" cried Ted, deeply aggrieved. Then, twisting around, he caught sight of his captor and grinned at him in a friendly way.

"Why don't you sell papers?" demanded the other boy, releasing him. "The last edition will come out before long, and you'll get stuck."

"Goin' ter," asserted Ted, stoutly. "Say, Jimmie, what's that in your pocket?" With sudden curiosity he snatched at a queer object which protruded from the inside of his friend's coat.

"Le' go!" Jim struck down the venturesome hand. "That's my life-preserver. Want to see it?" And with all of an inventor's pride he drew out a peculiar sort of clamp which he always carried about.

It was formed of two pine sticks rudely whittled into shape and hinged together at one end. On the inner side its jaws were faced with heavy strips of glass, whose use was not at once apparent.

"What's it for?" asked Ted.

"To handle live wires with. The glass is proof against electricity," explained Jim.

Ted eyed the strange instrument with increased respect. "Did any live wires ever get loose round here?" he asked, eagerly. "Say, Jimmie, le' me try it if they do?"

"They might break any time," Jim replied, sagaciously. "You go and tend to your papers; you haven't any business with the power." He dropped the clamp into a pocket, and, grinning significantly, raised his switchrod as if to strike the newsboy's leg.

But Ted glanced cunningly down the street. "Aw, there's a car!" he cried, and forthwith seized the chance to dart away and yell back derisively at his friend.

"They might break any time," he repeated, quite seriously. Once he had ventured to question officer Wayne: "What would you do if a wire broke?"

"Live wire? I'd clear the street and send for Higgins." Higgins was foreman of the repair gang. "If it dropped onto anybody, I'd have to ring up the ambulance, of course."

With a hearty respect for the force that kept all these cars in motion, Jim had picked up, from motormen, linemen and engineers, a store of practical knowledge which he was eager to put into

But Wayne would not argue. "You stay here!" he gruffly commanded. "Be quiet now! If you make any more trouble I'll arrest you!"

Indignant as Jim was, he had too much sense to contend longer with the policeman. But he felt that he represented the "road," and he was not yet defeated. Slipping back in the crowd, he ran around its outer edge and worked through at another point, whence he made a sudden dash for the wire.

A sharp, warning cry arose, for the bystanders looked to see him instantly killed. Wayne and others sprang forward, but before they could reach Jim he had seized the scintillating wire with his clamp. He raised it from the pavement, and lo! the live thing became tame and apparently harmless. He bore it to the corner of Pleasant street, the ring of people broke and followed him excitedly. It was a moment of peril for the heedless crowd, and Officer Wayne, seeing now that the boy knew his business, turned back to guard the sagging wire.

Jim glared with open contempt at the people who pressed about him. "Fo'ks are fools about electricity!" he growled. "Just because the wire isn't sputtering they think it's dead!"

"Can you hold it that way a few minutes?" asked Wayne, looking doubtfully at the blockade of vehicles on all sides.

"Of course I can!" said Jim impatiently. "I could hold it all day. Why don't you move your teams? Have you sent for Higgins yet?"

"We've telephoned."

By this time the other policeman had come to Wayne's assistance, and the corner was rapidly cleared. On the farther track cars began to move north; the motormen started them slowly, and passed cautiously under the hanging wire, which Jim had straightened as much as possible, and only the southbound cars lay helpless in a long line on Main street.

"What can be done with these?" asked Wayne. "Nothing?"

"There's a switch on Main street a hundred yards away," answered Jim. "Run back to the switch and take the left track!" he shouted to the nearest conductor.

As a general rule a switchboy does not give orders to a conductor; but Officer Wayne stood beside Jim and imperatively seconded his commands. Word was passed along, and the line of cars moved back to return on the other rails.

The first motorman looked to Jim for further directions.

"Run to the switch in front of the City Hall, and shift back to the right track." Jim turned to Officer Wayne. "That's all," he said. "Keep 'em moving, and tell 'em to mind their own switches. I've got my hands full here."

People shudder when they think of the possibility of sudden death by violence or accident. There is a sentimental horror attached to such a death that makes people prefer the grim monster in almost any other guise. Yet all the lives that are lost each year by violence and accident are but an insignificant fraction to the untold thousands that are slain by the grim destroyer, consumption. It is the most insidious and the deadliest of all known diseases. It knows neither rank nor wealth. It attacks people in all the walks of life. It makes no distinctions. It has for centuries been considered incurable. It is not.

An almost unfailing cure for consumption is found in Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. It acts directly upon the lungs and also corrects the aggravating cause of the disease. It corrects all disorders of the digestion, invigorates the liver and makes the assimilation of the food perfect, thus nourishing and strengthening the system for its battle with its relentless foe. It fills the arteries with the rich, pure blood of health. It builds new, healthy tissue in the lungs and drives out all impurities and disease germs. It cures 98 per cent. of all cases of consumption. Thousands have testified to their cures. All druggists sell it.

"I was taken sick in February, 1887, with typhoid pneumonia," writes Mrs. Henrietta Hart, of Voorheesville, Albany Co., N. Y. "I then had a miscarriage. I did not leave my bed to sit in a chair till the first of June. I had medical care all that time. I was so weak I could not turn in bed alone. The doctor said he could do no more for me. I was coughing and raising and was almost dead with consumption. I gave up to die. I took seven bottles of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery and 'Favorite Prescription' together (not seven of each), and I was then able to do my own housework for my family of four. In less than three years from the time I began your medicine, I gave birth to a healthy baby girl that weighed eight pounds. I have had two children since, and am enjoying good health now."

Pretty eyes, bright, snappy and full of fire and life. Constipation makes the blood impure, and the eyes get dull and heavy, glazed and listless. Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets cure constipation speedily and permanently. They never gripe. They are tiny, anti-bilious, sugar-coated granules. One is a gentle laxative, two a mild cathartic. Druggists sell them.

"That speaker seems to be very popular with the audience."

"I have my doubts," replied the contrary man; "I noticed they applauded him a great deal more on getting through with his speech than they did for commencing."

ledge which he was eager to put into use.

His opportunity had been long in coming, and this day promised to be as monotonous as any other. But 15 minutes later the long-expected accident occurred.

A car from the west side came out of Pleasant street and started north. As it swung around the curve its trolley slipped off and caught between the copper wires, snapping one of them near their junction.

The wire dropped into the street, and for a moment there was indescribable confusion as it bounded and writhed among frightened horses and scattering people. The corner was quickly cleared, and at a safe distance a ring of spectators formed to watch the wire spitting out blue and green flames on the pavement.

Down on his Centre street switches Jim had been startled by a quick, jarring ring of the wires. He did not need the cries and commotion, the rush of people and the stopping of cars to tell him what had happened. Instantly he saw that his chance had come, and running up he broke through the ring just at Officer Wayne's elbow.

"Live wire!" he gasped, plunging a hand into his coat pocket. "I can fix it!"

He had started forward impetuously, but Wayne caught him by the arm and pulled him back, understanding only that the boy meant to run into danger.

"Stand back!" said the officer, sharply. "Don't you know a live wire when you see it? If you touch that, you'll never know what hurt you."

"It won't hurt me!" cried the struggling boy, in a hot rage at this opposition. "I've got something to handle it with."

switches. I've got my hands full here."

On the corner near by stood a group of people who annoyed Jim with idle questions and comments upon his courage in holding the wire. Courage? He had not thought of it, though he was proud that he knew how to handle the power.

But no one spoke of his particular invention until Higgins arrived, clad in rubber boots and gloves which protected him from electric shocks.

"Have you got the wire, boy?" he asked. "What's that you're holding it with? By George, you'll do!" he exclaimed, taking note of the glass insulators. "But why didn't you ground the wire—touch it down to the rails?"

Jim laughed. "And stop the cars!" was his terse comment.

Higgins cast him a shrewd glance, and turned to his man. "Here, Jones," he said. "Catch hold of this contrivance. Now, boy, we'll manage the rest of it. Get back to your switches."

"He had grit," some one remarked as Jim ran off. "That was a risky thing to do, wasn't it?"

"We have to take chances," Higgins briefly answered. "The lad knew what he was about."

But though he said little he was aware that this young employe of the road had ated quite beyond his own line of duty. For this reason he reported the whole affair to the superintendent, and Jim was summoned to appear at the office after his day's work.

Ted heard the message, for since the episode of the broken wire he had hung around his friend continually.

"What'll they give you, Jimmie?" he asked in hopeful excitement.

"Oh, maybe a hundred shares of stock and a special car."

This reply was designed to tax the newsboy's credulity, for Jim only wanted a chance to display his invention. And like many another inventor, he forgot that his work could be easily done in a different way.

The superintendent was reading his evening paper when Jim entered the office. Common report among the employes had made him a man of strict rules and penalties, yet he did not seem as austere as Jim had imagined. "I was ordered to report here," said Jim, advancing to the desk.

"James Connolly, switchman at Hamilton corner?" asked the superintendent.

"That's my name."

"How old are you?"

"Seventeen."

"Higgins says you managed that break pretty well this afternoon. And you kept the cars moving. How did you handle the wire?"

"With this." Jim had expected the question, and in quiet triumph he passed his clamp over the desk. The superintendent smiled queerly as he examined it.

"Crude, but effective— and scientific," he commented to himself. Then aloud: "Higgins has another method of protecting himself which you will perhaps find more generally convenient."

He detected a look of disappointment on the boy's face, and added: "This is certainly ingenious. How did you happen to have the thing in your pocket?"

"Didn't happen," said Jim, bluntly. "I always carry it; I made it a-purpose."

"For just such an emergency? You seem to understand the power."

"I know you can manage it, but you can't fool with it."

"That's so," the superintendent assented, pleasantly. "It doesn't stop to joke. Well, your knowledge of that fact is more valuable than your invention. There are other boys who can turn switches, and Higgins needs a helper. He asked for you. To-morrow you will instruct the lad whom I shall send you, and on Monday you will report to Mr. Higgins. You are promoted to the repair gang."—Youth's Companion.

Stamps and Collectors.

Newfoundland is to have a new issue of stamps to consist of seven denominations.

England will not permit stamp catalogues to contain illustrations of English stamps, but it does permit illustrated albums made in Germany to be sold in England. The stamp dealers think this inconsistent, and so it is.

An enterprising firm of Geneva lithographers have been doing an excellent business in counterfeiting stamps. Recently they had the audacity to attempt to copyright these imitations, but the Swiss government would not let them go that far.

Some of the utterances in relation to philately are very amusing. A writer comments upon auction sales of stamps, and objects vigorously to them, on the score that the prices realized are not up to catalogue values. "To-day," he says, solemnly, "one can buy almost any stamp he wants at from one-half to two-thirds of the catalogue price." It would seem to be apparent that this is proof that catalogue prices are too high, but the writer does not see it in that light.

B. C. CARTER, G. A. BROWNE, H. B. SHERWOOD

To walk out right to daily bread,
To not regret when time is fled,
To wisely speak and act and think,
To keep life's boat from ruin's brink,
To balance every hour's expense,
We need the aid of common-sense.

Sometimes, no doubt, we need to view
The lightning bolts some genius threw!
But now we need, well mixed and stirred,
With silent thought or spoken word,
A sort of human fool's defense—
The wholesome aid of common-sense.

Some things, perhaps, must still be taught,
Where mighty minds their power inwrought;
But how to guard the priceless wealth
Of peace and love, of youth and health,
And how to keep our own few pence,
Is taught alone by common-sense.

We pray for faith, and light and peace,
For sin's remove and love's increase,
For strength to meet the tempter's power,
For dying race, for dying hour.
But, now, right in the present tense,
Give us, O Lord! good common-sense.

To keep from useless jar and strife,
And bless the changing path of life,
To make each fountain purer still,
To take from loss its fatal chill,
And bring Thy own sweet recompense,
We bow to thee, blest common-sense.

Wished to Be Prepared

"I wish, my dear," said Mr. Frankfort to his wife, "that you would let the hired man bring my rifle down from the attic while I get some other things ready."

"Your rifle?" she repeated. "Surely you are not going hunting?"

"Not at all."

As he spoke he took a bowie knife from its sheath and began to sharpen it carefully on a whetstone.

"What is that knife for?" asked his wife.

"Well, I hope I shall not have occasion to use it, but it is best to be prepared.

As he said this he examined his seven shot revolver and filled the side pocket of his coat with cartridges. By this time the hired man had brought the rifle, and Mr. Frankfort made sure that he had a good supply of ammunition for the weapon.

"My dear," begged his wife, "won't you tell me what all this means? You say you are not going hunting. What do you need of all these weapons?

"My darling," replied the brave man, "do not be anxious. It is more than probable that I shall return alive, but if not, you will find my will made, and my life insurance policy is valid. Kiss me, dear, and hope for the best."

"But where, oh where, are you going?"

"Have you forgotten that I am a member of the Kentucky Legislature, my dear? I go to attend a regular session."

And before she could protest the brave man had snatched a kiss from her pale forehead and departed.—Louisville Courier-Journal.

"So you," asked the newly arrived shade, "are Nebuchadnezzar? I have always wanted to ask you why you ate that grass."

The shade of Nebuchadnezzar coughed uneasily. "To tell the truth," he said, "my wife insisted on having the green cut right away and the family next door had borrowed the lawn mower."—New York Press.

BOY WITH THE JEW'S-HARP.

How tender is the new-born grass!
The earth again is fresh and young—
But where's the boy that used to pass
A-twanging of his jew's-harp tongue?
For he was youth and joy and spring;
His bursted shirt sleeve showed his wing;
And how he made the buzzer sing!
O, where is the boy with
The jew's-harp?

The jew's-harp boy was red with tan,
One trouser-leg exposed his knee;
The other whipped the little man
With tattered shreds when gamboled he.
His bare toes in the green grass curled,
He cared for nothing in the world
But how the jew's-harp music purled—
O, where is the boy with
The jew's-harp?

He called it juice-harp. His moist teeth,
All stained with berries from the woods,
Did clamp it with their ivory sheath—
It was the best of all his goods.
Unsight, unseen, he swapped and hung
His trophies round him; but he clung—
Excepting when it lost its tongue—
To that dearest thing,
The jew's-harp?

Sometimes I dream he has come back.
Has left the football, wheel and bat
And walks the same old village track,
A-twanging underneath his hat.
The low, sweet drone, the buzz and sting
Of jew's-harp tunes around me cling!
O, he was youth and joy and spring!
Where—where is the boy with
The jew's-harp?

ONLY A MISSING "M."

One Saturday morning I was sitting at my desk opening my correspondence, when I came across a letter which conveyed to me news that considerably shocked me. My old friend and client, Sir Douglas Renwood, was dead, and the letter announcing the sad intelligence was from his nephew, and ran thus:

"—— Cottage, Staines, June 1.—Dear Mr. Geary: I have to inform you of the sad death of my uncle. He passed away at ten o'clock last night. It was all terribly sudden. He caught a violent chill last week, which developed into inflamation of the lungs. We sent for Dr. Holmes, the leading doctor here, but he could do no good, and the end came last evening.

"I write to you because I think it desirable that you, as the leading family adviser, should come down here at once to arrange for the funeral, and also to go into other matters connected with my poor uncle's estate. Yours faithfully,

"MARK RENWOOD."

"Aha!" said I to myself, as I concluded the reading of the letter, "the other matters which Mr. Mark refers to are closely connected to himself. He is the next of kin. Douglas died unmarried. This means £20,000 a year to my young friend."

"Good heavens!" I said to myself, "can this be possible—can this be possible?"

For something I had seen in that certificate had connected itself with something I had seen in another document that morning, and the sight of the two things filled me with an awful suspicion.

And I determined to act on that suspicion and to act at once. Asking Renwood to excuse me for half an hour, as I wanted to call on a legal friend, who lived in town, I hurried away.

I was going to call on Dr. Holmes, whose name was at the foot of the certificate recording the death of Sir Douglas Renwood.

I had to wait some time at the physician's house, as he had numerous consultations in progress. After an hour of terrible anticipation in the dull waiting-room, I was at length ushered into the doctor's presence.

"Dr. Holmes," I said, "I have not come to see you professionally, but rather to ask you one question."

He seemed surprised, but simply said: "Go on."

"Did you sign a certificate of death, through inflammation of the lungs, of Sir Douglas Renwood, who now lies dead at the place called —— cottage?"

He jumped up from his chair in amazement.

"My dear sir," he cried, "what on earth are you talking about? I know nothing whatever of Sir Douglas Renwood, except that he is reported to be a man of eccentric habits, as he refuses to have any servants in his house."

The suspicion which had been darkening in my mind grew darker as he spoke these words. In a moment I had risen from the chair, and, walking quickly to the doctor's side, I said:

"Doctor, there has been some foul play in this business. Sir Douglas Renwood lies dead and I have just seen a certificate of his decease bearing your name at the foot."

The doctor looked astonished.

"Then it is a forgery," he cried. "I have never signed a certificate of this man's death. More than that, I did not know even that he was ill."

I thought for a moment and then said:

"Our way is clear. We must go at once to the police station and get a warrant for the arrest of the man who produced that certificate as coming from you. That man is Mark Renwood, Sir Douglas' nephew and—heir."

The doctor gave me a quick glance.

"His heir, eh?" he said. "Come, perhaps we are on the brink of a discovery. It seems to me that there is more in this business than meets the eye."

I thought so, too.

An hour later Dr. Holmes, a couple of plain-clothed policemen and myself entered the cottage. Bidding the two men to be close at hand in case of need the doctor and I went straight upstairs in search of Mark Renwood.

He did not seem in the least astounded at the appearance of the doctor. Evidently he imagined that he was the "legal friend" on whom he fancied I had gone to call, for he held out his hand with a smile.

"Any friend of yours, Mr. Geary," he said, "is welcome here. Introduce me, please."

Wondering whether he was merely playing a part or was sincere, I formally introduced the two men.

"Dr. Holmes—Mark Renwood."

A terrible change came over Renwood's face and he clung to the table for support. He tried to speak, but words failed him. The look on his features told what I had already guessed.

There was no time for idle thought or conjecture. I touched the bell and the two constables appeared in a moment.

"I give this man in custody," I said, in a loud voice, "for uttering a forged death certificate. Whether a further charge, and a more serious one, will be added, remains to be seen."

Renwood uttered not a word. With a white, scared look, he suffered himself to be led from the house, and thence into a conveyance. Our way lay in the direction of the police station.

A coroner's inquest was held on the body of Sir Douglas Renwood, and the verdict of the jury, following on the doctor's post mortem examination, was "Willful murder against Mark Renwood."

He was accordingly committed for trial at the next assizes.

The incident which served to convict him was the forged certificate. He could assign no reason for the forgery, and therefore the jury had no option but to conclude that the man who had administered to the deceased the subtle poison which caused his death was his nephew, the man who stood in the dock.

Sentence was passed accordingly, and on the night before his execution he sent for the chaplain and made a full

EVOLUTION.

When Esmeralda got her wheel
And first began to ride,
She wore a long and graceful skirt
That was her joy and pride;
But soon her equanimity
Received a dreadful check—
Rude Boreas took that graceful skirt
And wrapped it 'round her neck!

She gathered all her mental force
To solve this monstrous riddle;
She lengthwise cut her riding skirt
Exactly in the middle.
She shortened it; and then did sew
A seam on either side;
And in her new divided skirt
She proudly forth did ride.

But when she'd worn it just a week
She heard a dreadful rumor—
Divided skirts had lately been Succeeded by the bloomer.
She put a wide elastic band
In the hem below the knee,
Which made as neat a bloomer
As one would wish to see.

But to her most esthetic eye
It really seemed distasteful:
The way those bloomers flopped about
Was shocking and disgraceful.
So she took them to a tailor,
Who fitted, sewed and pressed;
And now she rides in knickerbockers
As beauteous as the rest.

PUTTING UP A PORTIERE.

The Experience of a Southern Woman That Has Often Been Duplicated.

She—I had the worst time this morning. I hung a portiere in my room. I wouldn't let the upholster do it, and I wouldn't let anybody help me, because I wanted it in a particular way.

He—I didn't know you knew about—

She—I don't; but I was bound I'd do it. Well, I'd asked them where I bought the pole to have it sawed off the right length and they hadn't done it, and I had to get a saw and do it myself. I couldn't saw it even and I got all out of patience saying "good gracious!" till Aunt Mary looked at me over her glasses; she doesn't approve of expletives for young women.

He—You are sure it was "good gracious?"

She—It was at that stage. I got the brackets up all right, but I drove a nail art way into an end of the pole to start a place to screw in the fancy end, and when I tried to pull it out I broke it square off and I couldn't pull the piece out. I was so provoked.

He—What did you say then?

She—I said "Plague take it!" There was nothing to do but saw off an inch or so to get a fresh end. I had a fearful time doing it. It looked as if somebody had chewed it off, and I sawed my fingers.

He—And you said—

She—I said "Confound it!" right out loud and Aunt Mary went out of the room. I got the pole up finally and stretched my arms till they were lame and got both ends screwed on and then I found I'd forgotten to put the rings on. I was perfectly desperate. My neck ached, and my back, and I was getting dizzy—

He—And you continued your remarks?

Fusel Oil.

Hargreaves—I made a mile on my wheel the other night in less time than I have ever been able to do so since.

Wallace—It must have been freshly oiled.

Hargreaves—No, I was.

We know that Cod-liver Oil is a fat-forming food because takers of it gain rapidly in weight under its use and the whole body receives vital force. When prepared as in Scott's Emulsion, it is quickly and easily changed into the tissues of the body. As your doctor would say, "it is easily assimilated." Perhaps you are suffering from fat starvation. You take fat enough with your food, but it either isn't the right kind, or it isn't digested. You need fat prepared for you, as in Scott's Emulsion.

married. This means £20,000 a year to my young friend."

I then proceeded to continue my work of opening the morning letters, and, finding that there was nothing of urgent importance therein, I determined to act on Mark Renwood's suggestion and go down to Staines without a delay.

I sent for my head clerk and told him of my intention, bidding him also to find out when there was a train from Paddington. He soon returned with the information that I could catch a good one at 12.30, and I accordingly drove to Kensington and collected what I required for the journey, and an hour later was seated in a first-class carriage on my way to Staines.

I had announced my coming by telegraph from Paddington, and I was therefore not surprised to find young Renwood waiting for me when I alighted.

He was a tall, thin young man, with strong aquiline features and small, gray eyes. I had known him since he was at Eton, and he held out his hand to me with a cordial smile.

"I am delighted to see you come so soon, Mr. Geary," he said speaking in a hearty tone, "but I wish you had come on more joyous business. This is a sad affair, indeed."

"Sad enough," I rejoined, "and yet we must all die some day or other—else where would the young ones come in?"

The cottage was about half a mile from the station, and our journey took us along the river bank. As we passed the boathouse on the slope, he said, in a low voice:

"This is the spot where my poor uncle contracted the chill which caused his end. He and I were walking along this path one evening, when we heard a cry for help, and the next moment a child's head appeared above the water. I, of course, would have plunged in, but, as you have perhaps noticed, I am suffering from a temporary sprain, and could not swim an inch. My uncle, knowing this, threw off his coat, and, swimming to the spot where the child was fast sinking, rescued it just as the youngster came up for the third time."

"This Dr. Dolmes," I queried, "was he a really good man?"

"I believe he is the best doctor in these parts. Had I known things were so serious I would have wired to town for our own man, but I never dreamed that such was the case."

"Poor old gentleman!" I said. "And he was to have been married soon, was he not?"

"Yes. That is the oddest part of the business. He looked forward so much to giving up the state of bachelordom in which he had lived, and now—well, it's no use talking of the past."

"All the same," I could not help remarking, dryly, "it is not such a terrible thing for you that this marriage did not take place. Had it done so there might have been an heir to the estate, who would have cut you out most completely."

He looked up with a hasty glance.

"Oh, Mr. Geary," he said, "I cannot think of things like that at a time like this. My uncle was a father to me, and better than many fathers. I am well-nigh stunned by the blow—money matters just now seem to me very small indeed."

"Well, well," I said, somewhat testily, "we cannot do without money, whether we think of it or not. But here we are at —— cottage, for, I suppose, this is the place."

"This is the place," he answered. "Come in."

I followed him into the cottage and up the stairs, until we came to the room where the dead baronet lay.

I went slowly toward the bed on which my poor old friend and client rested, and, drawing aside the sheet which covered the dead face, took a last long look on the features I knew so well.

I was roused from my reflections by the entrance of young Renwood, who came up to the bedside and pulled out his cigar case, several papers dropping from his pocket at the time.

"Have a cigar!" he said, as I stooped to pick up the papers, and then, seeing a shade of annoyance that I could not conceal cross my face at the thought of smoking at such a time and in such a place, he said, hastily: "Perhaps we'd better not smoke, though; it's hardly decent in a room with death in it."

His sudden glow of proper feeling did not impress me and I merely handed him the papers he had dropped in silence.

One of these he handed back to me. "You'd better look at that, Mr. Geary," he said, abruptly; "that is Dr. Holmes' certificate of death."

I glanced at the document. Yes, it was all in order. "Douglas Keaneth Renwood, aged 65," and so on, but when I came to the heading, "Cause of Death," I gave a violet start.

on the night before his execution, he sent for the chaplain and made a full confession.

"I killed my uncle by means of a drug which natives use in certain parts of India for medicinal purposes, and which leaves the features calm and composed after death. My uncle was about to marry, and, in the event of his doing so, and having issue, I knew that my chance of a great estate was gone. So I brought him down to Staines and kept him under lock and key in the cottage."

How did I discover the forgery? By the fact that I knew Dr. Holmes' handwriting, and detected the difference? Not a bit of it. The doctor's handwriting was as unknown to me as the first Pharaoh. No. It was simply on account of the fact that the death certificate here the cause of death, "inflammation" being spelled with one "m."

In the letter from Mark Renwood with which this history begins the word occurred with the latter omitted, and it struck me as being very curious that two men should make a mistake over the same word. So curious was this apparent coincidence that I pursued the inquiries which ended as I have described. If Mark Renwood had been a better speller he would, in all probability, be alive at this hour."—Cassell's Journal.

Use Good Dairy Bulls.

"The difference between a good milk cow and a poor one is great," says The Iowa Homestead, "and no farmer is unwilling to recognize it in the price he asks or pays. He will sell one animal from his herd, say for $25, and be glad to take it, while, for another, he will refuse twice as much. This is all right, for when it is done it is because the owner knows that the one is worth twice as much as the other. But if this difference is recognized by the farmer so readily in the case of the cow, why is it so frequently ignored when buying a bull, or selecting one to use on the herd? Everyone admits that for any purpose "the bull is half the herd." If a farmer has a herd of twenty good cows, he can easily see how there can be a difference of $5 a head between them and the same number of cows a little poorer in dairy quality, and the aggregate of the difference for the female half of the herd is $100. But if he is going to buy a bull, the difference of $100 between one that suits his purpose well, and one that does not suit it so well, would, in the majority of instances, drive him into taking the poorer one of the two. Yet, why should it? He recognizes the difference as one that he can afford with regard to the female half of the herd. Why not on the other half?"

Jerry Simpson's Gold Tooth.

"Have you seen Jerry Simpson's gold tooth?"

That's the question Congressmen are asking each other. The topic is one of paramount interest. Since it came to the front Hawaii, Cuba and the tariff have paled into insignificance.

All is not gold that glitters, but there is not the slightest doubt about the 18-carat quality of this monometallic incisor of the Populist leader from the Grasshopper State. It looms up clear across the House like a lighthouse in a fog when Jerry smiles, which is quite often of late, and Speaker Reed was so nearly hypnotized by it that he almost nearly forgot to adjourn at the proper time on Thursday last.

Various explanations are offered why Jerry got a gold tooth instead of a silver one. Some say it is because he holds that gold should be used only for utilitarian purposes, and that he has no objection to gold, per se, but that as a standard of value it is entirely too high up for ordinary people.—Washington Post.

A TASTE FOR THE ANTIQUE.

Plain, ol'-fashioned people! Them's the kind I like;
Either keepin' still or tellin' truths where they will strike.
Never sayin' "not at home" to callers down below,
Nor sendin' "their regrets" to where they didn't want to go.
Ef they said, "Glad to see ye?" way there wan't more to tell;
They didn't say to sick folks, "Dear, you're lookin' very well?"
Them's the sort that really seems to suit my sentiment—
Folks that never spoke without your knowin' what they meant.

Them was our forefathers. They didn't throw no flowers
To please the pride of others when they didn't care for ours.
They riz right up and lectured till the very air was blue
About "our lives, "our fortunes," and "our sacred honor," too.
They didn't choose long sentences that only waste your breath;
They summed it up in "gimme liberty or gimme death!"
I like to read their words again that echoed o'er the sea,
Plain, ol'-fashioned people—them's the kind for me!

Just a Supposition.

"Of course you can take a hint," she said, looking at him thoughtfully. He couldn't, and she knew it, and that's why she said it. It wouldn't have been necessary otherwise.

"Of course," he replied. "Have you been hinting at anything?"

"Oh, dear, no," she answered with suspicious haste. "I was just thinking, you know."

"Thinking of what?"

"Why, suppose—just suppose, you know—that I was a hint."

After pondering the matter deeply for several minutes he decided to take her.

The John Eaton Company, of Toronto, was destroyed by fire last May and on July 14th made an assignment. The published statement of the assignee shows a deficit of $101,828.08. The Bank of Toronto has for some time been carrying the company. A large amount of goods were purchased in England, United States and Canada on credit, and insured for all they were worth. After the fire the insurance policies were transferred to the credit of the bank without the knowledge of the creditors. Such an act is not liable to raise the reputation of Canada in England, despite all the good words spoken about it during the recent Jubilee celebration.

Mr. Dunning during his life had fourteen bones broken. The funeral took place on Sunday.

Big Time at Picton.

The monster demonstration to be held in Picton on Aug. 12, under the auspices of the Loyal True Blues, promises to be a grand success. Over fifty lodges have already promised to be present, and favorable replies from others are coming daily. A number of public speakers have been arranged for including F. Clarke Wallace, M. P., besides a large list of sports and games of all kinds. The committee are hard at work making all necessary arrangements, and will spare neither pains or expense to make everything enjoyable for their visitors.

I. O. O. F. Excursion.

It is a well-known fact that whenever Napanee Lodge No. 86 I. O. O. F. holds an excursion either by boat or rail, it will be first class in every respect. Every detail is carefully attended to and their patrons feel perfectly assured that nothing will be left undone which will add to the comfort and pleasure of the trip. This year through the work of an energetic committee they have arranged for an excursion to Montreal on Napanee's civic holiday, Aug. 11th. Full particulars can be learned from the posters. Montreal is full of points of interest, and those who wish to enjoy a delightful trip by special train we advise them to make their arrangements to go to Montreal on August 11th.

A Mystery at Kingston.

On Tuesday of last week Mr. Thomas Vanluven, of Kingston, treasurer of the County of Frontenac, disappeared and has not been seen since. On that day he took dinner at the Stanley House, and afterwards treated some friends to refreshments. He told them that his head had been bothering him for some time past. He also told some frinds he intended taking a trip to Montreal. Since Mr. Vanluven's disappearance the books have been examined, but everything has been found all right. Application has been made to Toronto for the Provincial Auditor, and he is expected to complete his work in about two weeks. Mr. Vanluven is most highly respected in the city, and his friends are of the opinion that something has happened him.

Lost Their Way.

On Sunday last Mr. Alf. Wagar, James Bowen and James Roblin, left for the Bald Mountains. The two first mentioned went to pick huckleberries while the latter went on a fishing expedition with Mr. Palmateer. On Tuesday morning Messrs. Wagar and Bowen went out on a tour to the berry patch but when evening came they failed to return to the camp. A searching party has been organized and everything done to find trail of the missing ones, but up to Thursday noon they have not been found. The place is uninhabited, there being not a house for many miles, with only the sun as a guide for those without a compass. During the past week there has not been any sunshine and the unfortunate men cannot find which direction to go. Another difficulty is in the way, that the searching party being unable to make the lost ones hear a gun shot owing to the hills not allowing the sound to travel. Without food it is feared the two men will perish from starvation. We hope the searching party may be successful in locating the lost ones.

Canada's Greatest Celebration of the Jubilee Year.

Fully alive to the times the management of the Toronto Exhibition, or as the title runs this year, "Canada's Great Victorian-Era Exposition and Industrial Fair," is to be conducted on a scale, from August 30th to September 11th, that will even transcend any former effort made to promote this, the most popular, most comprehensive and most attractive annual show held on this continent. Already a sufficient number of applications for space and of notifications of entries have been received to warrant the highest expectations. The management have increased the number of medals to be awarded and have made many improvements to the buildings and grounds, showing that they are resolved to leave nothing undone that will enhance the pleasure and comfort of both patrons and exhibitors. They have also determined on a special feature that promises to prove the greatest outdoor spectacle in the way of entertainment that Toronto or any other city has ever known, outside the world's metropolis itself. This spectacle will take the form of a reproduction of the wondrous Diamond Jubilee procession in London. Agents are now across the water hiring and buying the necessary properties and costumes, which will be an exact replica of the uniforms and costumes worn by the soldiery, the sailors, the nobility and the yeomen of the guard in the magnificent procession. Scenes will also be reproduced of the ceremonies at Buckingham Palace, St. Paul's Cathedral and other places along the line of the route. Many interesting specialties will also be introduced, while at night the effect will be heightened and magnified by brilliant illuminations and fireworks. Not only will spectators have brought home to them the grandeur and unity of the empire, but they will be practically taken home to Old London. While dwelling on this grand feature the material aspect of the Exhibition must not be lost sight of, therefore it is well to mention that entries of live stock, and the majority of the departments, close on Saturday, August 7th. Programmes containing all the details of the attractions will be issued about the 10th of August.

Napanee Victorious.

On Saturday afternoon last a cricket match was played at the Napanee Driving Park between the home team and Deseronto eleven, resulting in a victory on the first innings. Napanee went to bat with G. Maybee and Leonard at the wickets, against the bowling of Egar and Allen. Egar was a snap for friend Maybee, who ran up a score of 39 before his wicket fell. Clayton Maybee was the fourth man to bat and father and son kept the crease warm for a while. They drove the ball all over. What Egar was to the senior, Hensley was to the junior, and he made a score of 34 before Crooke stopped the fun. Georgie Harrison made a score of 19 before his wicket fell. For the visitors, Hamilton, Egar and Clinton did good work, making double figures. The bowling for Deserfonto was done by Allum, Crooke, Hamilton, Egar, Stokes and Hynes, while for the home team, Hill, Harrison, Baines, H. Daly and F. Maybee assailed the wickets. The bowling on both sides was good. The home team did some smart fielding and showed themselves in this line superior to their visitor. The following is the score.

Miss Lilly Dunbar, of Toronto, is visiting friends in Napanee. She came down by steamer and had a very rough and exciting trip.

According to press despatches the indications are that there will be trouble between the United States and Japan on the Hawaiian affair. The Government of Japan is sending 1,500 Japanese emigrants to Honolulu. A Japanese man-of-war will leave Yokohama to arrive at Honolulu at the time of the landing of the emigrants.

The extensive improvements in the Huffman cemetery (West Napanee) which we made mention of a few weeks ago—the laying out in plots of the central portion of the ground—is being done by Mr. Robert Dennison, at his own expense. We are pleased to note this fact and must compliment Mr. Denison on the manner in which the work has been done. He has the spirit of a philanthropist.

Just before the rain shower on Saturday evening, a vivid flash of lightning, followed instantly with a clap of thunder, started many of our citizens. Later it was learned that a house in the east end of the town, occupied by James Long, was struck. Mrs. Long, who was sitting in the kitchen was stunned. Some clap-boards were torn off the kitchen, but no further damage was reported.

On Sunday last a tramp, who was walking on the railway track near Adams, Jefferson Co., N. Y., discovered a washout. He went to the residence of a farmer named John Williams, told him, and passed on. Williams flagged a coming passenger train with sixty people on board. The train was stopped and the passengers took up a collection amounting $13.24, which was given to Williams. The tramp got nothing.

The Str. Hamilton from Toronto had a rough trip on Monday. She left that city at 6.30 p.m. and did not arrive in Belleville until 3 o'clock Tuesday afternoon being six and a half hours late. She was fifteen hours making the trip from Toronto to Cobourg which is usually made in six hours. Four men were at the wheel all night. This steamer experienced a severe storm last fall on an up trip. Capt Grieves formerly of the Quinte is master.

Killed at Vennachar.

At Vennachar, in Northern Addington. Angus Thompson went with his brother to cut hay. They carried scythes. On the way Angus slipped and fell upon his brother's scythe, cutting a frightful gash in his left side. In his writhing to secure release, he threw himself upon his own scythe, cutting his right leg. The wounds were fatal, and in half an hour after leaving he was carried home a corpse.

Aliens Are Shut Out.

There have been reports in some of the newspapers that the understanding between the Government and the Canadian Pacific Railway with regard to the Crow's Nest Pass Railway and ailen labor was not being carried out, and that the first of the contracts had been let to Foley Bros., an American firm in St Paul, to build 35 out of the first 50 miles. It can be stated on authority that none have been given except to Canadians. The contracts have been given to the following: Mr. Strevel of Winnipeg, Mr. Doheny of Cobourg, Mr. McCrimmon of Calgary, and Mr. McArthur of Winnipeg. The Foley Bros. have no contract and American contractors have been informed that none but Canadians can have their tenders considered. Clauses will be inserted in all the sub-contracts taking power on the part of the company to cancel the contracts if there is any violation of the rule against the employment of alien labor.

Sudden Death.

On Tuesdey evening last Mr. Rufus S. Merrell, of Boston, superintendent of the works at the Fredericksburgh oil wells, died suddenly at the Paisley House, where he was stopping with his family. During the day deceased had been around in excellent health, and in the afternoon paid a visit to the wells, returning about 5 o'clock. After supper he sat down in the sitting room, reading and chatting until about 7 o'clock when he went upstairs to his room. He was reading a book and about 9 o'clock he felt a dizzy sensation and laying the book down said to his wife "send for a doctor and then come and fan me." After speaking these words he went into a state of unconsciousness from which he never aroused. Dr. Vrooman was summoned and on his arrival used all his best medical skill to recover consciousness, but without avail, and in fifteen minutes after the doctor was sent for the spirit of Mr. Merrell had departed. The remains were prepared for burial and laid out in the parlor of the Paisley House until Thursday night when they were taken by the midnight train to Boston for interment. The sympathies of the entire community are extended to Mrs. Merrell and two daughters in their sudden and sad bereavement.

JAMES A. CLOSE.

Hastings has a parachute artist in the person of Mr. Florence Tompkins, of Campbellford. He did the trick at Madoc on July 22nd.

The number of drowning accidents which have occurred during the past few weeks is alarming. There is scarcely a day passes but records of these sad fatalities are read, the cause of which has been either by the upsetting of a boat or those unable to swim getting beyond their depth. Proper accommodation should be made for those unable to swim and all boats should carry life buoys. Human life is too precious to be sacrificed.

The blue-ruin prophesied by tory papers as a result of the Liberal tariff seems to have been side tracked all along the line. Even the wire fence business, over which so many tory tears were shed, refuses to ruin, and the London Free Press tells about a Cleveland firm which is talking about establishing a plant in the Forest City to employ 25 men and do a business of $200,000 a year. More than 1,000 hands are at work in McDonald's tobacco factory, and the Cockshutt Plow Works is increasing its capital from $100,000 to $250,000. No wonder the tory prophets of evil are ex-

Mining in Hastings county has not at any time during the season looked as encouraging as it does now. While news of fabulous wealth has come from the far distant Klondike, the steady results obtained in all sections of the Hastings district have far more attractions for the experienced miner. During the past two weeks some of the largest investments of capital yet recorded have taken place and there is everywhere an indication that before next spring the gold, lead, silver and other mines will be operated on a larger scale than ever in the history of Ontario's great mineral fields.

At a Cabinet Council held on Tuesday at Ottawa the subject of the Yukon was again under consideration, and it was decided that the royalty to be levied on the gold taken out of the country would be 10 per cent on all amounts taken out of any one claim up to $500 a week, and after that 20 per cent. This ought to give the Dominion a handsome revenue. And in addition, it must be remembered that, as already announced, every alternate claim is to be reserved by the Government for the benefit of the public revenue. This policy seems to be very generally approved here by all those who take an interest in the subject.

ONE HONEST MAN

DEAR EDITOR—Please inform your readers, that if written to confidentially, I will mail, in a sealed letter, particulars of a genuine, honest, home cure, by which I was permanently restored to health and manly vigor, after years of suffering from nervous debility, sexual weakness, night losses and weak shrunken parts. I was robbed and swindled by the quacks until I nearly lost faith in mankind, but thank heaven I am now well, vigorous and strong, and wish to make this certain means of cure known to all sufferers. I have nothing to sell and want no money, but being a firm believer in the universal brotherhood of man, I am desirous of helping the unfortunate to regain their health and happiness. I promise you perfect secrecy.

ONTARIO LADIES' COLLEGE.

SOMETHING ABOUT A LEADING CANADIAN EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTION.

Only those who have a personal knowledge of Canadian and American Colleges can fully appreciate the present magnificent equipment of the Ontario Ladies' College at Whitby, or the great strides that this institution has been making during the past few years, in providing for the higher education of young women. In solid literary work it is the recognized leader, as it is the only college in Canada sending up students for the first and second year's examinations with honours of Toronto University. The same efficiency characterises the departments of music, fine art, elocution, commercial branches, and domestic economy. One unique feature in the musical department is a large pipe organ in the new concert hall, for the use of organ students.

The main building, modelled after one of the old palatial homes of English aristocracy, supported on the north by Ryerson hall, and on the south by Francis hall, presents a scene of beauty, perhaps unequalled in Canada, and with few equals on the continent. Every home comfort is provided in steam-heating, electric lighting, and modern sanitary plumbing. No wonder that the students of the Ontario Ladies' College are happy and successful, and that leading educators turn their thoughts to this college as the one best fitted to indicate the high-water mark of Canadian attainment The Rev. Dr. Hare has been principal of the college since its inauguration, in 1874, and will be pleased to give further information relating to its work —TORONTO MAIL. 37ap

At the last meeting of the council the matter was amicably arranged, and the walk will be constructed outside the trees.

Threshing is now the order of the day, and the farmers appear well satisfied with the result of their summer's work.

Sherman Fox, Picton, started a short time ago for the Klondike.

Apples are said to be very scarce articles in this county which is something unusual for Prince Edward, but doubtless the shortage is the result of the ravages of the tent caterpillars, last spring. Fruit growers will soon get to understand the value of spraying orchards.

Mr. VanBlaricom had been ailing for the past year, suffering from the effects of a paralytic stroke, but he died very suddenly and unexpectedly as he appeared to have been improving. He was a grand-son of a U. E. Loyalist and was born and lived the greater part of his life on the old homestead farm on the high shore, but tiring of farm life he removed to Picton where he has lived for the past thirty-five years. ABOUT THE TOILET.

How to Prepare Dainty Dentifrices and Harmless Face Powders.

If you wish to keep your teeth in perfect order, cleanse them thoroughly twice a day with a little pure camphorated chalk, or other harmless preparation. Avoid all tooth-powders which contain cuttlefishbone or other substances likely to scratch and injure the enamel. Salt is a cheap, safe and effectual dentifrice: so, also, is powdered borax. To prevent the appearance of tartar, eat freely of common cress. This will even loosen tartar if eaten two or three times a day, successively for a week. The same effect is produced, though perhaps not in an equal degree, by eating strawberries and Suffered from Infancy.

THE WAND OF MISERY WAVED OVER MRS. THOS. GREEN.

From Her Childhood She Suffered from Heart Troubles—Doctors Said Nothing Could be Done For Her, and that Her death at Any Momert Would Not Surprise Them.

From the Herald, Stratford.

"Of the making of books there is no end," it has been said, and the same claim might be set up in respect of the making of testimonials in favor of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. Wonderful as are some of the statements published in the newspapers as to the cures effected in all parts of the country, fresh evidence proves the half has not been told. Were it not for a false sense of delicacy which a great many people entertain in regard to such matters, the columns of the press would be literally teeming with grateful acknowledgements of benefit derived from and permanent cures effected by the use of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People. It is quite within the mark to say that there is no other medicine offered the public that can at all compare with Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, and there is not a corner in this wide Dominion in which their virtues have not been proved. A cure which recently came to the knowledge of a representative of the Herald is deserving of being widely known. It is an instance of heart trouble that baffled the skill of a number of physicians, some of whom positively refused to treat the patient on the grounds that it was no use. The subject of affliction referred to is the wife of a highly respected and well-to-do farmer in the township of Logan, near the village of Dublin. Mr. and Mrs. Thos. Green are firm believers in the efficacy of Dr. Williams's Pink Pills, and for very good reasons. Mrs. Green has suffered everything but death from a weak heart, the trouble having afflicted her since early childhood. On several occasions she has been so low that it was not thought possible for her to recover. Her greatest trouble often arose from exhaustion or a sudden start, and at such times her heart seemed to cease its throbbing and the breathing was fitful and labored. Doctor's medicine seemed to have no effect whatever. She was advised by one physician that all that could be done was to keep her strength up, and it was with a view to strengthening her system, and with no hope that her heart would be benefitted that she began the use of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. She had not been taking them long, however, when there was unmistakable relief from the trouble that had made her whole life miserable. During the past summer she has used Pink Pills freely, and has enjoyed better health than for many years before, and has been able not only to do her household work, but also many of the out door chores that fall to the lot of a farmer's wife. The different physicians who have treated her have frequently told her husband that they would not be surprised to hear of her death at any moment, but she is to-day a strong woman, enjoying better health than she has done for years. Both Mrs. Green and her husband feel grateful for the great benefit she has received from the use of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, and spare no words in enquires what has wrought such a wonderful change in Mrs. Green's health and spirits.

In cases of paralysis, spinal troubles, locomotor ataxia, sciatica, rheumatism, erysipelas, scrofulous troubles, etc., Dr. Williams' Pink Pills are superior to all other treatment. They are also a specific for the troubles which make the lives of so many women a burden, and speedily restore the rich glow of health to pale and sallow cheeks. Men broken down by overwork, worry or excesses, will find in Pink Pills a certain cure. Sold by all dealers, or sent by mail postpaid, at 50c a box, or six boxes for $2.50 by addressing the Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont., or Schenectady, N Y. Beware of imitations and substitutes alleged to be "just as good."

What a Touch Does.

A Parisian touch is given the regulation white pique Eton coat and skirt by wearing a white tulle vest and a black gauze scarf, which fastens underneath the jacket on either side of the front, crosses in the waist, and ties behind with long sash ends. The front of the jacket should be cut out in some odd shape to display the vest, and, with a stiff white linen collar and a plaid necktie, the effect is stunning.

An Occasional Poke Bonnet.

An occasional poke bonnet, made of colored tulle, wired and shirred into shape, tied demurely under the chin with tulle strings and trimmed with small roses, is seen at the fashionable garden parties; but it is the exceptional face that can resist the effect of suddenly added years which this old-time shape is almost sure to produce.

At the Queen's Garden Party.

Pink and white gowns prevailed at the Queen's garden party, and one very striking dress of pink muslin over white silk was trimmed with cream lace insertion in waved lines around the skirt, all edged with a little frill of black chiffon. Other pink muslin gowns were trimmed with frills of Valenciennes lace from the hem to the waist.

For Fashionable Gowns.

Black grenadines, in various conventional patterns, made over colored silk are very fashionable gowns this season, and the variety of fancy grenadines has no limit. One novel design is a fine black ground with a scroll design in white silk threads all over it. Other kinds are corded in bright colors.

What Veils Are Like.

Bright dark blue veils are very much worn in Paris, but white cross-bar net with black chenille dots is more generally worn here with the light-colored straw hats. A fine black lattice net powdered with tiny spots, and all the new Russian nets without any spots at all, are equally famed.

TAMWORTH.

The weather for the last few days has been very cool. Reports say heavy frosts have done some damage to vines, etc. The farmers will nearly finish their harvest this week if the weather keeps fine. Crops are abundant. The root crop looks fine. Potatoes promise an abundant crop again this year, making now four successive years of heavy crops.

Our village is steadily improving although the cry of hard times is everywhere heard.

Mr. S. Shields has finished the veranda in front of his hotel, improving the appearance very much.

Mr. Robt. Caswell has erected a driving shed in connection with his livery, adding greatly to the looks and improvement of his barn.

Floyd & Son have renovated their tailor shop, enlarging it, placing an extra window in the front and one in the rear, making a very desirable tailor shop.

Mr. John Wheeler has placed a new fence around his lawn.

Our village last Tuesday morning had an early wedding from Marlbank. The ceremony was performed at 7.30 a.m. in the Anglican church by Rev. J. R. Serson. In the evening we had another quiet wedding, Mr. Wm. Wages to Miss E. Jones at the parsonage by Rev. Lewis, at 8 o'clock, again on Thursday evening at the manse, Mr. Harvey Paul to Miss Mabel Jones by Rev. Ballantyne. We wish the happy couples every happiness.

Our school was opened last Monday, being delayed one week as it has undergone a thorough repair during vacation making it a first class grounds and school. The ground has been ditched and raised, placing new outbuildings and walks from entrance to them the school has also been overhauled. New floors, new walls inside, new siding outside, new doors, in fact it is in a good state of repair now. A new well has been added, new pump and new fence.

C. G. Coxall has erected a fine steel tower in connection with his store and private residence, giving him an abundant supply of water. The tower is sixty feet high, with a tank of thirty barrels in it, twenty-five feet high, enabling him to place a good stream any place in his store in case of fire by means of fifty feet of rubber hose which is attached, also connecting with his lawn and garden, enabling him to have an abundant supply at all times. The mill is of the latest make having an automatic regulation so as to adjust the fan etc., at any time without any help. It is from the Ontario Wind and Pump Co., of Toronto.

The Rev. J. R. Serson and Mrs. Early left last Tuesday on a short tour, via Niagara Falls and New York. There was no service Sunday in the Anglican church; service as usual next Sunday at 10.30.

We saw Mr. Shyler Kennedy on Monday walking with a cane. He has an abscess on his leg—a very sore thing. We hope he will soon be all right again.

If eaten two or three times a day, successively for a week. The same effect is produced, though perhaps not in an equal degree, by eating strawberries and raspberries, especially the former. A leaf of common green sage rubbed on the teeth morning and night, cleanses and polishes them beautifully.

A most refreshing antiseptic dentifrice, useful when the teeth are decayed, may be made up from the following recipe: Tincture of quillaia bark, two ounces; pure carbolic acid, thirty drops; pure glycerine, one ounce; oil of wintergreen, ten drops; oil of cinnamon, two drops; essence of cochineal, twenty drops; water, twelve ounces; mix well together. A teaspoonful of the mixture should be added to half a tumblerful of water to clean the teeth and rinse the mouth.

When the gums are spongy and receding an astringent wash is generally necessary, otherwise the teeth are apt to become loose. Here is a recipe which will be found both pleasant and efficacious: Tincture of orris root, six drachms; lavender water, two drachms; tincture of cinnamon, four drachms; tincture of cinchona bark, four drachms; eau de cologne, two ounces. Add half a tumblerful of water to rinse out the mouth twice a day. Another equally efficacious and pleasant preparation, called violet mouth-wash, is composed of tincture of orris root, four ounces; essential oil of almonds, one drop; attar of roses, one drop; salicylic acid, four grains; proof spirit, two ounces. It should be used in the same proportions as the preceding recipe.

One of the best and simplest powders for the face is composed of plain corn flour, scented with a little very finely powdered orris root. Pure starch should be lightly dusted over the skin with a swansdown puff, not rubbed into the pores. Face powder should be carefully and regularly removed from the face every night with soap and water, otherwise it is likely to prove injurious, by clogging the gland orifices and preventing the perfectly free action of the skin.

If your skin is inclined to be rough and coarse in texture, or sallow in appearance, you cannot do better than use a cosmetic made from horseradish. Well scrape and wash some horseradish roots, cut into very thin slices, or scrape as if for horseradish sauce; pour over about half an ounce of the roots a pint of boiling milk, cover it closely and leave to infuse until quite cold. Strain with pressure, and the decoction is fit to use. First wash the face with soft water and good soap, rinse, and dry thoroughly, and then bathe the skin with the horseradish infusion. The process may be repeated two or three times a day.

To Breathe Correctly.

As a matter of fact not one person in a hundred breathes normally. A little knowledge of physiology and a few hints on the subject, however, will enable anyone to comprehend the precise art of filling and emptying the lungs on scientific principles. The main thing is to be sure that the lower lobes of the lungs are well filled with air and that one breathes from the abdomen. After one has acquired this habit the chief thing is to breathe in as much sunshine as possible, and to believe in the efficacy of oxygen as a remedy for nearly all the ills that flesh is heir to.

The following are some excellent rules for improving the respiration, and bringing it up to a normal condition: Stand at an open window or recline on a couch with the waist and chest unconfined; hold the chest walls high and inhale in slow long breaths; exhale as slowly, three times only at first. Gradually the number of times may be increased and the time lengthened for the breathing exercises. Fifteen minutes, twice a day, at least, should be devoted to this exercise to accomplish the desired results. To inhale long, deep breaths while slowly raising the arms above the head, and to exhale as slowly while lowering them is one of the best breathing exercises ever invented. The practice of breathing very deeply while walking in the open air is recommended not only for the general health, but is one of the best cures for obesity, as the increased amount of oxygen greatly augments the consumption of waste material.

Hood's Pills

For last week

Well Mr. Editor as I have not seen anything from Morven in your most valuable paper in some time I will endeavor to collect a few items.

Quarterly service was held in the White church on Sunday morning and was largely attended. Rev. Shorey gave a most excellent sermon.

It is rumored we are to have a new church in our midst soon.

Rev. Clarke, of Belleville, preached in the Brick church on Sunday night as Mr. Shorey held service at the Lutheran.

Mrs. George Robinson sang a very fine solo on Sunday night, also she acted as organist in the absence of Miss Funnell who spent the week at Montreal.

Miss Shorey is at present camping.

Mr. Geo. Dracup and sister Hattie of Fairview and Mr. John Dunkley of Picton were guests of Miss Sharpe on Sunday.

Mr. S. Perry is still quite ill, also Mr. M. F. Vanslyck is on the sick list. We hope for their speedy recovery.

Geo. Robinson and family spent one day last week at Selby.

Mr. Dunn Valleau took a trip to Niagara last week.

DEATH LARGELY DUE TO HABIT.

A Scientist Explains How Thought May Determine Human Existence.

Dr. C. A. Stephens, a New England man, a graduate of the Boston University Medical School and a member of many learned bodies, built a laboratory several years ago at Norway Lake, near Norway, Me., and he spends almost all his time there in investigating the causes of old age and death, with the object of their alleviation and removal. Dr. Stephens published from his laboratory the close connection of all the cells in the brain by nerve fibre, enabling them to feel and act together about a year and a half before the discovery was announced by the great Spanish physiologist, Ramon y Cajal of Madrid.

Dr. Stephens says he is confident that the progress of brain science will enable mankind successfully to overcome decay and its climax, death. He points out that matter is indestructible and that the law of the universe is immortality. He believes that death at threescore and ten or thereabouts is largely a matter of belief and habit. Generation after generation is born into the world, expecting to die at a certain time, and it dies then. He very forcibly points out that if children were brought up with the idea of living forever this altered expectation would gradually but surely extend the life limit in the course of generations.

To prove that life lengh is largely a child of habit and environment he instances the elephant and the swan, whose ages run into the centuries, as compared with infusoria and moths, whose heyday of existence is but the fleeting moment. His studies have been particularly directed toward the microscopic examination of the brain cells of the old and infirm. He finds their nuclei dark and shrunken, just like the brain cells of the fatigued pigeons and of the honey bees, so graphically illustrated by Dr. Hodge, of Clark University, Worcester, Mass.

Dr. Stephens raises the serious enquiry as to whether the universal presence of microscopic "dirt" may not be a potent factor of old age and decay. He has found large quantities of foreign inorganic matter in old brain cells. He shows how this "dirt" is brought into the system by the inspired air (conclusions), through the cells of the lungs into the blood, and finds its final refuse heap in the cells themselves, where it increases in amount hourly, and escapes the metabolism constantly occurring in

"PRINCESS OF THE KAFFIRS."

The Child Who Will Inherit the Great Wealth of Barney Barnato.

Barney Barnato left a little "Princess of the Kaffirs" to inherit his great wealth. If the noted financier and promoter was worth all the money he was said to have been worth, this little lady will come into one of the biggest private fortunes in the world. Barney left another and an elder child, if Mrs. W. W. Blackman of Cleveland is right in her claim, for she says that she, too, is the daughter of the diamond king of Africa. Mrs. Blackman's mother has gone to England to protest Barnato's will. The mother is a Russian, and she says that Barnato married her in Russia twenty-seven years ago. The Kaffir King was known at that time as Barney Brolobjitschy, and he disappeared in a most mysterious manner many years ago. Mrs. Blackman says that, although she was very young when her father disappeared, she remembers him very well and really recognizes him from his latest photographs. Her mother is now at work with her lawyers in England, making arrangements to go into court and protest the will, in which Barnato left the bulk of his hundreds of millions to his widow and his little daughter. The case promises a big fight.

Women as They Pass

In Bosnia, which is under Austrian rule, it has become necessary to provide women physicians for the Mohammedan women, who are not allowed to see a male doctor. The first one to be appointed is Dr. Theodora Krayewska, a Pole by birth. Her appointment comes under the head of army surgeons, therefore she is compelled to wear a uniform. Her rank is equal to that of a captain in the army, and she draws the same salary as an officer of that rank. She is obliged to travel through the entire district to look after sanitary conditions, and to insist upon compliance with the sanitary laws on the part of the population.

Invitations to a "bloomer lawn party" from a church society of women in St. Louis recently stirred up great excitement and criticism, but the demand for tickets was tremendous. One of the conditions of the invitations was that all the women should wear bloomers, and those who were not properly equipped in that respect were to be provided with the articles on their arrival. When the crowd arrived on the night of the bloomer party it discovered all the women adorned with immense sunflowers, which were the bloomers which had invited so much criticism.

Miss Lell Segeur, superintendent of the city schools of Decatur, Ind., refused to swear to the assessor's list, or to give him a list of her taxable property. For this she was arrested and fined $18. She believes that if she cannot vote she should not pay taxes.

SILENCE is golden—dead men tell no tales at the Klondike.

THE Goderich Signal, a Reform journal, is firing hot shot into M. C. Cameron, the Liberal member for west Huron, because he had his son-in-law appointed post master of the circular town. Tory journals are printing the Signal's scathing condemnation of Cameron's conduct with glee. Many prominent Conservatives during the late regime were guilty of nepotism but we have yet to learn of a single instance where a Tory editor had the courage to condemn them.

THE Reformers of the good old County of Lennox and Addington have been fortunate in their choice of candidates for the local house. Both are strong, representative men and acceptable to the rank and file of the party. In Lennox the popular and well-known warden of the county, Mr. Bowen E. Aylsworth, has been placed in the field and we believe he will carry the forces to victory in the next provincial election. Mr. Alysworth is a successful farmer and one who has had a long and varied experience in municipal affairs. The Government he represents has proved itself to be a clean, economical and efficent one, tareful of the interest of the province and anxious to promote the welfare of the people. In Addington a bright, energetic and popular medical man has been selected as standard bearer. In the rear of the county, where he is known, Dr. Coutlee is highly esteemed and respected and his many good qualities of head and heart appreciated. Although he is a comparative stranger in this district we have been given to understand that the doctor intends fraternizing with the Liberals of this vicinity shortly and thus remedy this defect. THE NEWBURGH POST OFFICE.

In noticing the dismissal of Mr. Douglas Hooper from the postmastership of the Newburgh post office the Beaver insinuates that he was removed because of his political leanings, thereby endeavoring to score a point against the Government. Our contemporary would make it appear that there were no charges or complaints against Mr. Hooper's administration of the office. Of late years a great deal of dissatisfaction was felt at the way in which the office was conducted and in consequence of the numerous complaints made, the inspector felt called upon to investigate the matter. He found that the office was not run in compliance with the postal requirements and Mr. Hooper was informed that he would have to make certain changes in the management. He neglected to comply with the regulations and now finds himself minus the position. The charges against Mr. Hooper were not of political partisanship and the complaints against his management were not confined to Reformers. The inspector who conducted the investigation was of the same political stripe as the late postmaster and he found that it was time for a change. Personally we have not a word to say against the dismissed official and would not have alluded to the matter had not the Beaver in its eagerness to score the Government endeavored to convey an impression not borne out by the facts. The following letter, which has been forwarded to the Beaver for insertion in this week's issue, is from a prominent citizen of Newburgh and throws additional light on the subject:

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "NAPANEE BEAVER".

Dear Sir,—I notice in your issue of last week, that Mr. Douglas Hooper has been dismissed from the postmastership of Newburgh, for political partizanship without any charges being made against him. You certainly must have been misinformed for while the writer has every respect for Mr. Hooper, it must be known that there were charges made against his manner of running the Newburgh post office (not charges that he was a partizan.) These charges were investigated by the inspector, which investigation was noted in your paper and on the report of the inspector, who certainly, cannot be charged with favoring the reformers. Mr. Hooper was required to make certain changes in the management of the office. The order he ignored and consequently was dismissed. I would remark that we are all sorry for Mr. Hooper, but his best friends long ago advised him to resign or run the office as ordered. But he saw fit to take the advice of a few hot heads that were sure to get any man in trouble and the consequence is he is no longer postmaster, and now the discomfiture falls on his ill-advisers who certainly make more of a cry about it than Mr. Hooper himself.

Knowing that you have no desire to misrepresent even the Reform party in your paper I ask you to publish this letter in justice to the business men here, who finding the post office management was to the detriment of the business interests of the village took the only course open to them to have it remedied where kindly advise failed. I am your obedient servant, heap in the cells themselves, where it increases in amount hourly, and escapes the metabolism constantly occurring in the minute tissues, the rejuvenation of organic material, and the constant birth of fresh physiological structures.

The vastly superior power of brain cells to resist decay suggests to Dr. Stephens the invincibility of thought life in its final victory over death's decay. This very suggestive experimental st refers to the mental change which habit induces soon after each individual has reached the "prime of life." Up to that point there is energy and hope in all the tissues. After that point all the histological structures of the body lose heart, and make no effort to stem the tide which sets for "the downward path to death."

The doctor declares that the achievement of modern special education, which enables the deaf to hear with their eyes, and tones up relaxed vocal chords, which brings it to pass that the blind see with their fingers, taken in connection with the great longevity of ancient races, as described in the Old Testament, and as authenticated in monuments, shows that unusual length of life has been a fair accompli of history, and suggests that the determination of life length is possibly and practically within the domain of thought.

As humanity in its physiological expression is wholly a compromise with perfection, Dr. Stephens argues, better food selection and a more watchful outlook against the introduction of foreign and inorganic material into the system cannot help increasing the life potential of each unit of the race.

Dr. Stephens holds that what is known as "soul" is merely cell experience, the knowledge acquired by cells, collectively and individually, during years of hereditary transmission. This view is the same held by Sir William Thomson and Thomas A. Edison. He points out that father and child, death and life, generation after generation, are not the ideals of human society, but only its makeshifts. Immortal life is the real aim in view, and he believes it will be achieved in time.

The Lubrication Test.

Very few of the millions of people who carry watches realize to what a wonderful extent lubrication is developed, and what an extraordinary number of turns the balance wheel makes with one oiling. A Chestnut street watchmaker, whose knowledge of these wonderful pieces of mechanism is not exceeded by any man in this city, has made up an interesting table of comparison to show the perfection of lubrication in a watch.

A watch will run on one oiling from a year to a year and a half. Every minute the balance wheel turns on its axis 450 times and 27,000 times in an hour. Accepting a year as the time the ordinary watch will run with one oiling, he finds that if the driver of a locomotive was as well oiled as a balance wheel of a watch it ought to run sixty miles an hour day and night for 648 days, or well on to two years, with one oiling. In that time it would traverse a distance equal to nearly forty times the circumference of the earth.

In view of the fact that in reality few locomotives will run one day without reoiling; he maintains that the watchmaker has developed his art to a far greater degress than the locomotive builder has yet been able to reach.—Philadelphia Record.

The lovely pink produced by the Diamond Dyes is a discovery that has gladdened the hearts of thousands. This Diamond Dye Fast Pink for Wool is clear, pure, brilliant and fast as a rock. One package gives a magnificent shade of pink on two pounds of goods—silk or wool; a medium shade on three pounds; or a light and delicate shade on four pounds.

Attention is also called to the Diamond Dye Fast Light Blue for Wool. This is a dye that gives a color far surpassing the light blues produced by European dyers.

Ladies having soiled white or cream dresses made from cashmere, nun's cloth or serge can have them dyed in rich shades of Pink or Light Blue and fitted for evening wear. Mrs. Florence Maybrick.

The British Government has again declined to interfere with the sentence of Mrs. Florence Maybrick, on the ground that there is no reason for a change of judgment on the matter. The last effort to secure at least an amelioration in the conditions of her confinement was made by Ambassador Hay, who had some correspondence on the subject with the Foreign Office, which he has transmitted to the State Department. Lord Salisbury appears to have called for a report in the case from the Secretary of State, and the latter regretfully stated that he was unable, in view of the conclusion which has been reached by himself and by his predecessor as to Mrs. Maybrick' guilt, to recommend her to Her Majesty that any exceptional treatment should be accorded to her. The secretary also added that the medical report in Mrs. Maybrick's case was quite satisfactory, an evidence that the Government does not credit any of the statements as to the insanity of the prisoner.

Colors to Wear With Red Hair.

If the women with red hair would only study how to use it becomingly they would be proud of the distinction of having it instead of being dissatisfied with their lot. There appears to be an impression among women with red hair that almost any shades of blue can be worn by them, because, as a usual thing they have fair and delicate complexions, but, as a matter of fact, blue is the one color above all others that they ought to avoid. The contrast is too violent and the combination is not harmonious. The shades most suitable to be worn with red hair are bright, sunny brown and all autumn leaf tints. After these may be selected pale or very dark green—but never a bright green, pale yellow, and black unmixed with any other color. Mixed colors are not becoming to red-haired people, as they nearly always give them a more or less dowdy appearance. In fact, red hair is usually so brilliant and decided that it must be met on its own ground, and no vague, undecided sort of thing should be worn with it.

The fly lays four times each summer, and 80 eggs each time.

A bumble bee has been known to distance a locomotive going 20 miles an hour.

Female spiders are much larger and more ferocious than the males, and often devour their husbands.

Along the coast of Florida and Georgia the musical notes of what the old fishermen call the "singing shad" are often heard. They differ from the common shad in being smaller and also in the formation of their mouths. Their singing is pleasant at first, but soon grows monotonous, owing to the fact that it is a constant repetition of the same sounds.

Paper Pillows.

Paper pillows are a recent invention. The paper is torn into very small pieces, and then put into a pillowsack of drilling or light ticking. The pillows are very cooling in hot weather, and are said to be superior to feather ones. Newspapers are not nice to use, as they have a disagreeable odor of printer's ink, but brown or white paper and old letters or envelopes are best. The finer the paper is cut or torn the lighter it makes the pillow.—Good Health.

A KLONDYKE BRIDE.

MRS. CLARENCE J. BERRY IN HER YUKON WINTER COSTUME.

The Strange Honeymoon of These Two Young People—How Their Bravery and Pluck Won Them a Fortune—A Story of the Mines.

Clarence J. Berry.

THE Barnato of Klondyke, by name Clarence J. Barry, is now one of the most talked of men in California. Berry is supposed to have brought out more gold than any other one man and is said to own more mining property than any one in the district. Berry is a modest-appearing young man of about 30 years of age and lived most of his life in the San Joaquin Valley, California, and until he went up to the Yukon in February, 1896, had never known very much of the good things of this world.

But Mr. Berry is a gentleman of some business ability, as he has proven, and expects to be a millionaire before he is very much older. And Mr. Berry does not take all the credit of having made more than $100,000 in less than a year, but modestly says that the responsibility for his good fortune may be attributed to his wife more than to himself. Theirs is indeed a strange story. Not many young people would choose a trip to the wild and unexplored regions of Alaska for a honeymoon journey. Yet this is what these two did. In Fresno County in February, 1896, Mr. Berry married Miss Ethel Bush, the daughter of a well-known resident of the little town of Selma, and immediately they started for the goldfields of Alaska.

However sanguine their dreams of new found wealth may have been, they have been more than realized. From

St. Peter stood at the pearly gate,
And gazed down the narrow way
Up which toiled the souls of those whom fate
Had numbered to die that day.

And marvelled he much that among the throng
Was one who was blithe and gay,
And merrily trundled a wheel along
Up the straight and narrow way;

Nor did he appear to burdened be
O'ermuch with his load of sin,
For, doffing his cap to St. Peter, he Proceeded to enter in.

But Peter cried: Not so fast, my friend,
Your sins have been too great.
I'm sorry to say your journey's end
Is not at the pearly gate."

The merry wheelman knew not dismay,
But answered, "Good Saint, 'tis well—
I'd be much obliged if you'd kindly say
How the roads are that lead to hell."

"Now, stay," cried St. Peter, "and tell me, I pray,
How is it you seem not to care
Whither you go or where you stay,
And not for your soul's welfare?"

"Oh, as for me, it matters not,"
The wheelman quickly replied,
"If the place be cold or it be hot,
So long as I can ride."

BIG ENGLISH STRIKE.

ALL KINDS OF INDUSTRIES STOOD STILL FOR SIX WEEKS.

Reminiscences of an Old-Time Labor Man Recalled Which Are Interesting—How Sympathy With the Strikers Was Made Sure and Certain.

Thomas Grundy, the well-known labor leader of this city, was a participant in some of the famous strikes which occurred in England forty or more years ago, and his recollections of the manner in which they were conducted and his comments upon the good which they accomplished are interesting just now, when strikes and rumors of strikes are engaging the attention of nearly everybody. Mr. Grundy is now upward of 60 years of age, and has been a hard worker in the labor movement nearly all his life. He drew his first inspiration from a mob of striking weavers who, when Mr. Grundy was seven years old, called at the schoolhouse where he was beginning his education and compelled the teacher to give the scholars a vacation. This was a unique form of enforced sympathy strike, which Mr. Grundy has never since seen duplicated. He had sometimes wondered at the tameness of labor struggles which he has since witnessed compared with what he saw in his boyhood's days, but as he remembers his feeling on the great occasion it was simply one of satisfaction that the strikers should relieve him of the necessity of going to school.

According to Mr. Grundy's description of this strike it must have been one of the greatest labor struggles that ever occurred. In 1842 the condition of the cotton workers in Lancashire, Yorkshire and Cheshire had become so bad, owing to the introduction of machinery, that a general strike movement was brought about without any organization and at first without leadership.

In its spontaneous character it seems to have much resembled the present miner's strike now on in half a dozen states, though Mr. Grundy insists that the miners have possessed great advantages for the inauguration of a general strike compared with what the weavers had on that occasion, as the latter were absolutely without any organization whatever. During the six weeks industry of every kind was entirely suspended in the district affected, it being estimated that in the neighborhood of 3,000,000 people were idle. This included the weavers themselves and persons of every other occupation whom they obliged to leave work. The small tradesmen and manufacturers were obliged to close their places, the teachers in the schools had to send their pupils home, and the strikers even prevented the passing of vehicles upon the highways by massing themselves in compact bodies through which no horse could be driven.

Mr. Grundy having been very young at the time this strike occurred, most of his information about it has been gathered from reading. The incidents which he remembers are principally the Paine's Celery Compound Conquers After Years of Failures With Other Medicines.

Mrs. G. H. Parker, of Winona, Ont., was for eighteen years a complete martyr to neuralgia, that cruel and merciless tormentor of thousands of old and young in Canada. During her long years of agony she had the services of some of the best medical men, and consumed any quantity of patent medicines, but all failed to drive off the tyrant that was making life a burden. At last she was persuaded to test the power and virtue of Paine's Celery Compound, and the happy results that rewarded her faith are described in the following letter.

"I have been a great sufferer from neuralgia for nearly eighteen years; these sufferings at times were so bad that words would fail to describe them. After having tried every known remedy and different physicians, and receiving no help, I was persuaded to try your Paine's Celery Compound, which I have been using for the past four months. I am happy to say that I am now a different woman and completely cured. I can recommend your Paine's Celery Compound to all my friends, for it has been worth hundreds of dollars to me."

Curious Facts About the Toad.

The toad lives ten to forty years, does not begin to produce young until the fourth year, but then lays over 1000 eggs a year. It has lived two years without food, but cannot live long under water. It never takes dead or motionless food. It takes its food by means of its tongue alone, and it operates this so rapidly that the eye cannot follow its motions. It captures and devours bees, wasps, yellow jackets, ants, beetles, crickets, weevils, caterpillars, moths, etc. The stomach that doesn't flinch at yellow jackets, wasps, blister beetles, and click-beetles or pinch bugs would seem to be prepared for anything in the insect line, and it doubtless is. In twenty-four hours the toad consumes enough food to fill its stomach four times. A single toad will in three months devour over 10,000 insects. If every ten of these would have done one cent damage the toad has saved $10. Evidently the toad is a valuable friend to the farmer, gardener and fruit grower, and can be made especially useful in the greenhouse, garden and berry patch.—Galveston News.

How They Came to New York.

The following conversation took place

However sanguine their dreams of new found wealth may have been, they have been more than realized. From Juneau to Forty-Mile they journeyed, the ride bearing the unavoidable hardships of the trip without a murmur, notwithstanding a walk of 700 miles over vast ice fields and great mountains is one to try the courage of strong men. But Mrs. Berry never faltered, and not only reached Forty-Mile safely, but went to keeping house for her husband as soon as they arrived. At this place they did not meet with much success, and when the news came that George Cormack, or Carmike, as some of the men from Klondyke spell it, had struck gold on Bonanza Creek, Mr. Berry, without a moment's hesitation, started for the new discovery, taking all the provisions he could carry in a little boat which he purchased.

He was not destined, however, to reach the new district ahead of his wife, for soon after he started Mrs. Berry came to the conclusion she did not like life alone at Forty-Mile, and, woman like, acting upon the impulse, she packed all their household goods and took the first steamer in the direction her husband had gone. She soon took him and they proceeded to the diggings together. Arriving there, they met a young man named J. O. Clements, and Mr. Berry provided Clements and a man named Antone with a grubstake. In a short time all three had made their fortunes.

Berry furnished several men with grubstakes and each outlay netted him a marvelous return, and it is said that he brought down $150,000 to San Francisco. Mr. and Mrs. Clarence Berry evidently intend to make up for their long period of enforced privation, for packages addressed to the fair bride from local houses dealing in ladies' wear kept arriving at their hotel all yesterday afternoon and last evening, says The San Francisco Call. Mr. Berry says the exact amount he brought down is only a small amount of his wealth, and he would be a rich man if he never returned to Alaska, which he intends doing in the spring. It is not likely, however, that his wife will accompany him, as the incentive to acquire wealth has now been removed.

A Record Breaker.

"Delightful weather, isn't it?" remarked the Colonel, noticing that everyone in the crowd was gasping for air. "A little too warm, perhaps, for entire comfort; still it isn't a marker to the heat we had here in the summer of—well, four or five years ago. Do you remember that hot spell?"

Nobody did. Everybody groaned and the Colonel went on. "Sprinkling wagons were useless; the water was converted into steam before it struck the pavement. All the boulevards had to be repaved—the asphalt melted and ran into the sewers—and the elevator men made big fortunes selling parched corn."

"How hot was it?" asked one of the sufferers.

"Nobody knows," replied the old man; "there wasn't a thermometer in town which would register more than 240 degrees in the shade."—Chicago Times-Herald.

Wheeler—I find I can keep nicely cool by riding on my wheel.

Ryder—Yes; that ice wagon of yours ought to keep anyone cool.—Indianapolis Journal.

"No, sir, you don't catch me having anything to do with a wheel. I've had enough of it. Lost two teeth and a knee cap."

"But you shouldn't be discouraged so easily. Try it again."

"Try it again! Why, good lordy, I was walking?"—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

The Consoler—Oh, well, Looscout wasn't so very slow in that bicycle race, although he didn't come in first.

The Sorrowing One—No; I believe he did say the color in his sweater was fast.—Cincinnati Commercial Tribune.

"Now, then," exclaimed the irate father, as he squared off and began rolling up his sleeves, "I want you to explain why you stole my daughter away."

"I didn't steal her," the young man replied. "She went willingly, and there isn't a court on earth that will not agree with me."

"You lie!" the trembling old gentleman cried; "you know you lie! You got her out onto that tandem bicycle of yours and carried her away. Speak! Is it not so?"

"It is true," the other replied, "that we went away on a tandem; but that fact only proves that I could not possibly have taken her against her will. Have you ever been on a tandem?"

"No!" screamed the stricken father, "never!"

"Then that accounts for your ignorance in the present case. Didn't you know that a woman generally sits in front, and picks out the course to be pursued?"

With a heart-breaking groan the white-haired old man sank down, crying:

"Alas! 'tis true! I hadn't thought of that. What'll you have?"—Cleveland Leader.

Wanted Her Money's Worth.

Anyone who had not seen the woman with an angry eye wobble just before she dismounted from her wheel would have taken her for an experienced rider, a heroine of century runs. She strode with majestic confidence through the store, and so impressed another woman that she forgot herself and let the newcomer be waited on first.

"I suppose," she said to the clerk, that I looked rather new at bicycling, and that you thought that there wasn't much use bothering about me, because I wouldn't know the difference, anyhow."

The clerk assured her to the contrary, and said he was sure there was some misunderstanding.

"There was a misunderstanding," she answered. "I understood when I got this repair kit that I was getting all that a repair kit ought to contain."

"Certainly," he answered. "Isn't it all right?"

"Didn't you expressly state that it contained everything that would be required for repairs in an ordinary accident?"

"Yes."

"And I bought it with that implied guarantee, didn't I?"

"Undeniably, you did."

"And if things didn't turn out just as you represented them it's your business to make good the deficiency?"

"I suppose so."

"All right. There's your repair kit. You can either put in a paper of pins and some sticking plaster, or else give me back my money."—Washington Star.

Sapient Sucker.

"My, my!" exclaimed the sucker to the boy, who had just yanked him out of the water with a snare, "my, my, how modern improvements are spreading to be sure."

"Modern improvements?" returned the boy, inquiringly.

"Yes," answered the captive sucker, as he flopped himself over to a more shady retreat on the grassy bank, "who'd ever thought, for instance, that telegraphy would be used in fishing?"

"Telegraphy in fishing?" echoed the boy, in a dazed sort of way; "what are you talking about, anyway? Your lift into this climate must have rattled you a little. What's this sort of thing got to do with telegraphy in fishing, I'd like to know?"

"Why," responded the finny logician, as he lazily fanned himself with his gills, "how would I have known that you wanted me if you hadn't wired me?"—Richmond Dispatch.

Pain in the Back. DEAR SIRS,—I was troubled with pain in the back for months, and after trying several remedies without effect, thought I would use Hagyard's Yellow Oil. I am glad to say that after using two bottles I was completely cured, and cannot recommend this excellent remedy too highly.

MISS ANNA CHAPMAN.

of his information about it was even gathered from reading. The incidents which he remembers are principally the forcing of his teacher to dismiss school and the obliging of his father to suspend business. Mr. Grundy's father was a hatter, having a shop of his own and employing a few hands in the town of Ashton, near Manchester. The strikers came in a large body, and it was only necessary for one of them to say: "Put out that fire, Grundy," and the hatter immediately suspended all work in his little place and sent his men home to wait for the strike to be over.

Mr. Grundy remembers seeing bodies of the strikers marching along the highways thickly massed together and filling the roads from side to side as far as they could be seen. They were always armed with clubs, and when marching would line up close together, each grasping the club of the man on either side of him, and so weaving themselves into a solid mass. In this way it was rendered impossible for anything or anybody to occupy the road but the strikers, and their object of forcing a general suspension of business in the district was obtained. This was only for a little while, however, as large bodies of the troops of the empire were ordered into the district held by the strikers, and soon obliged them to observe the peace and desist from interfering with the affairs of those who desired to carry on business.

Mr. Grundy's recollection of the matter is that much sympathy was displayed for the strikers by the troops, and that the latter were of very little use so far as breaking the strike of the weavers was concerned. The strike was lost, however, the weavers going back to their work at the end of six weeks without having obtained any increase of wages or any shortening of their hours of labor. It was not long, however, until Parliament, as a result of this strike, began to pay some attention to the condition of the weavers, and laws which served very effectually to ameliorate their condition were passed.

Cobden, Bright and other great English statesmen took up their cause, and investigations and discussions resulted, the good effects of which are still felt. The repeal of the corn laws, by which English workingmen were enabled to obtain cheaper food, Mr. Grundy thinks, was largely due to this strike, though it had been advocated before the strike took place. Another law which was of great benefit forbade women and children under eighteen years of age to be employed in the cotton mills longer than ten hours a day. This law was not only a good thing in itself, but it caused the workers generally to think and agitate for a general ten-hour day, and some ten years after the great strike of 1842 there was a general strike for ten hours, which resulted successfully.

Mr. Grundy was employed in a cotton mill himself at the time this last strike took place. The workmen simply quit when they had worked ten hours one day, and so inaugurated a movement which was successful. Mr. Grundy says that at that time there was so little general education that many persons could not tell the time of day by a clock, and so in passing around the word for the inauguration of the strike everybody was instructed to stop work when the clock pointed straight up and down, this being a method of securing a more general understanding than to say 6 o'clock in the evening.

In the mill where Mr. Grundy worked the clock was watched all afternoon, and when the time came there was a general rush for the outside of the mill. The foreman had the gates locked and proceeded to harangue the workmen, but it was to no purpose. Several were notified that they were discharged, but this produced no effect upon them or the others. Mr. Grundy thinks that among ignorant workmen, that is, among those who are ignorant in the matter of education obtained from books, there has been as a rule more loyalty to each other displayed than by those who are fairly well educated. At any rate they stuck together upon this occasion, and won their strike so thoroughly that there was never afterward a general return to the old practice of working twelve or fifteen hours a day. In the mill where Mr. Grundy was employed, too, the manager, after the ten-hour system had been in force for some time, called the workmen together and expressed his satisfaction with it, saying that the results obtained were much more satisfactory from the standpoint of the proprietors than under the old way.—Pittsburg Dispatch.

How They Came to New York.

The following conversation took place between two gentlemen in a crowded New York clubroom. They had been talking about the condition of things when they first came East. Mr. Rawson said:

"When I first came to New York I had only a ragged coat, with a knife and a few marbles in my pocket."

"You were better off than I, then, for I had neither a coat nor a waistcoat, nor a knife, nor even marbles."

"Nonsense!" was the reply. "How could that be?"

"Well, I will tell you. When I came here I was a baby in long clothes."

The roar of laughter that arose could have been heard miles away.—Tid-Bits.

Just Why He Wanted a Pass.

The general passenger agent of one of the Chicago trunk lines received a letter from a Kansas man the other day requesting a pass for himself to Chicago and return. There was a thing about the letter to indicate that the writer had any claim to the courtesy he requested, but the railway man thought that perhaps the Kansan had some connection with the road, possibly as a local freight agent. So he wrote back:

"Please state explicitly on what account you request transportation."

By return mail came this reply:

"I've got to go to Chicago someway, and I don't want to walk."—Chicago Times-Herald.

"It makes me think so much of Christmas," she said the morning of the First of July.

"Of Christmas!" he roared, as he mopped the perspiration from his face.

"Of course," she answered, sweetly.

"Well, if you can tell me any way in which the First of July resembles Christmas," he returned, "I'll just about buy you that new hat that you have been asking for."

"They are the only two days in the year when we don't have any trouble getting the children up in the morning," she replied.

She gets the hat, but he isn't through kicking himself yet.

Good Pay.

"Of course you'll give me one little kiss before I go," he pleaded.

She looked at him intently for a minute and sighed.

"It's pretty high pay," she replied, "but if you will go early enough I suppose I'll have to call it a bargain."

He gave his entire attention for nearly five minutes to the consideration and interpretation of this answer, and then left in a hurry and without making any attempt to collect.—Chicago Post.

He Could Dodge.

"There's nothing slow about Jones," he said, reflectively.

The other laughed scornfully.

"I guess you never loaned him any money," he said.

"Oh, yes, I have," replied the first speaker. "That's what made me speak that way. I loaned him $10 six months ago and I haven't been able to catch him since."

STORIES OF YOUNG CANADA.

Some Good Though Unconscious Wit by the Little 'Uns.

A little boy who had a cousin living but three blocks from his home was given permission to stop and play there after school whenever he chose. The tempter soon whispered in Harry's ear that he might go anywhere under the pretense of having been at his cousin's home.

One evening after his mother had heard of her truant boy's wanderings she asked him where he had been since school closed.

"Down to Cousin Alfred's house," he replied.

Then she kindly said: "Harry, mamma knows you have not been there; now don't tell a lie, just tell the truth and all will be well." He replied: "How did you find out?" "Oh, a little bird told mamma." After which he pointed his finger with a little gesture of warning and said: "Don't talk to me about lying, birds can't talk."

A little five-year-old boy when told by his mother that they would go to see his baby cousin christened the following Sunday, replied with a troubled countenance, that "He hoped the rector would go home as soon as he was through with cousin." When asked why he said: "Well, I've had enough. I've had the measles—and such awful pains in my stomach. So I don't want to be christened."

The other day a little boy was heard relating to his chums his first experience in purchasing a pair of shoes. He said the salesman told him positively that the shoes would wear a long time and they had only worn two weeks. He declared he was going to have the salesman sued for "breach of promise."

A prominent oculist relates the following story which recently occurred in his practice, showing the natural brightness of some little children: The patient, a little boy 5 years of age, had some slight inflammation of the eye, and upon being interrogated as to the nature of the trouble replied: "Well, I don't know just how to tell it, but I don't get any light out of the eye."

SHE COULD NOT DISMOUNT.

But That Was No Reason Why John Should Have Said So.

"The stupidity and madness of some people passes my comprehension," snappily declared the girl who was the last of all her set to learn bicycle riding.

"Had another tumble?" inquired the girl who loves a joke, with a merry twinkle in her down-dropped eyes.

"Yesterday," continued the story-teller, without noticing the interruption, "I took my wheel and rode over to see Helen Starr. It's three miles to her house, as you know, and I was pretty tired when I got there, so I was sorry to see her brother John standing out on the stoop in front of the house. I—I can't always dismount gracefully, you know, and I didn't like to pretend my skirt was caught and ask him to help me off, for fear—well—for fear he'd think I couldn't dismount alone. So I decided to try it, and then, just as I got right in front of him, those blessed handle-bars turned and I ran into the curb and fell off in the mud.

"I was just as mad as could be, of course, but he was perfectly lovely. Helped me up beautifully, took my wheel into the house and fixed those horrid bars, although he would persist in saying that they didn't seem loose, the idiot! And when I came away again he insisted upon holding the wheel while I mounted by the house.

"'You can ride right to the gate and out to the street,' he kept saying, the stupid imbecile, and that's what I tried to do. But, oh, my dear! If you knew what I really did do!

"They have a wire fence bordering their grass, you know—just three wires strung along on top of each other—and instead of going through the gate I—I ran into that. The wheel leaned up against the fence peacefully, and wasn't hurt a bit, and I—I went over it. I thought I should die with shame.

"But I got up immediately, of course, and began to rail at those handle-bars for turning again, and then that lunatic of a John Starr actually insisted that they were all right, but that I made too short a turn, and he wouldn't rest until he proved it, not only to Helen, but to her father and mother and a host of visitors, who came trooping up just in time to see it. I tell you, girls, the unutterable stupidity of some people inspires me with positive awe!"

The Merry Jester.

"You shouldn't ride alone so far," he said, tenderly. "You should always have somebody to go with you and guard you."

"Haven't I my mud guard?" she cried flippantly, as she hopped into her saddle.—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

"They had a telephone at the farm house where I went to this summer."

"What did they use it for?"

"They telephoned to town every day for fruits, butter and fresh eggs."

"All men ought to stand by the miners."

"For what reason?"

"Look at the coal we husbands have handled for no wages at all."—Chicago Record.

"I'm not so big a fool as I look, doncher know," remarked young Mr. Willie Boy to Miss Point Breeze.

"Is it possible?" replied that young lady incredulously.—Pittsburg Chronicle Telegraph.

WILLFUL EMILY.

"Don't, Miss Emily, dear, don't!" I urgently pleaded with the willful young beauty who has so impetuously been relieving her mind to certain matters resting somewhat heavily thereon. I was only housekeeper at the Hall, but from long and faithful service, and the fact that the girl who had just thrown herself in such careless grace at my feet had lost her mother when almost too young to remember her, I felt more privileged than perhaps my position otherwise would explain. Not a child of my very own could be nearer my heart than was the spoiled, lovely little mistress of Carlton Grange. The squire was too busy with his chase, his hounds and horses to spare much time to the treasure which in reality lay nearest his heart. To give her her own way, to see her always beautifully dressed at the head of his table, to view with proud eye the slight, graceful figure perched fearlessly upon some favorite horse, to allow no one to cross her from her infancy—here he considered the duties of a father ended, and certainly, so far as begetting a most ardent love between the two, it worked admirably, though, as to the real good of my lady, I am by no means sure.

"And why not?" she questioned in answer to my protest. "I don't love him I—I hate him."

She was speaking of her cousin Arthur, but as she finished, the pretty head, which had borne itself so defiantly, went down on my lap, and the burst of tears which followed disproved the truth of her assertion.

No one could have seen the two together and not acknowledge their fitness for each other. Although but cousins a second time removed, a faint likeness was perceptible, but Arthur's mouth indicated greater firmness, and the will which was so necessary in the encounters between the two. He was the only one who did not give up to Miss Emily, who sometimes thwarted her, but always so gently, so tenderly, yet so firmly, that who had ridden off a few brief hours before so full of hope and happiness. And then, in broken words, she told the story. How, at a sudden turn in the road, she had caught sight of Mr. Arthur following her, and in very perverseness of spirit touched lightly with her whip the animal which needed restraint rather than urging, then turned her head in direction of the pits, a road at any time dangerous, but now, maddened by the touch of the whip, the mare had taken the bit between her teeth, and the little hands clenching the reins were powerless. Mr. Arthur saw her peril, and putting spurs to his horse in reckless defiance of harm to himself, had put him to the leap, endeavoring by leaving the road, to head her off and seize her rein. It was a race for life. A heap of stones lay upon the road. On one side there was barely room for a horse to pass. Could he reach that first, he might save her. There was no time to question. By an effort almost superhuman, he directed his horse to the pass, and seized the bridle which now lay powerless in her grasp. The mare swerved back, his own horse plunged, and, in some way, how, she could not tell, he lay beneath the maddened animal's feet, his head striking on the cruel stones. The shock had brought the mare to reason, which now stood still and trembling. But Arthur had saved her life by giving his.

B. G. CARTER, Gen. Pass. Agent. G. A. BROWNE, Gen. Pass. Agent. H. B. SHERWOOD, Superintendent.

sometimes thwarted her, but always so gently, so tenderly, yet so firmly, that I think herein lay the very secret of his charm. There was no regular engagement between them, but it was an understanding for all that, although half the young gentlemen in the county were contestants for the prize, but, save a little harmless coquetry, she gave them no encouragement.

I could but smile as I stroked her pretty golden-brown hair, while yet her head lay in my lap, at the very April shower which was all of grief my darling had ever known, for, ere I had quite finished my few words of comfort, applied I scarcely knew to what, she had once more sprung to her feet, and in a few moments I could hear her sweet voice carolling through the halls. Then under my window, I heard the imperative order to the groom: "Saddle Bess, Tom, and bring her round at once."

"She's hardly fit to ride, miss, this afternoon," the man respectfully answered. "She's skittish at the best of times, and she's been so long unused that I'm most afraid she'd prove too much for you."

"All the better," was the reckless answer. "Bring her round at once."

Glancing from my window as the voices reached my ear, I saw Mr. Arthur sauntering up the walk. He quickened his step a little as he overheard the discussion, saying, very quietly, as he approached:

"Surely, Emily, you will not be so rash as to mount Bess to-day? You must not think of such a thing."

The girl turned haughtily toward him, surveying him a moment in silence; then, as though remarks were unnecessary, turned again to the groom:

"Do as you are bid, Tom. I will now dress—"

"Emily, for my sake!" I heard him say in a low tone, but the contest of the morning in which her will had been forced to bend, made her determined now.

"You are detaining me, Mr. Trafford," she answered. "I shall have barely time for my ride."

"You must not, Emily; indeed you must not. My uncle would not wish it, and in his absence I must prevent it."

The color flushed like a crimson rose into the girl's cheek.

"How dare you!" she exclaimed, stamping he little foot. "How dare you speak to me? If you have ever considered yours the right it is cancelled from this moment. Heaven help the woman you would make your wife! She would be your slave. Give her my warmest sympathies, Mr. Trafford; I cannot offer my congratulations."

The young man's face flushed hotly, and he shrank from the words as from a blow, but he had no time to answer, for Miss Emily had already flown past him into the house, and I saw him turn and walk slowly to the stables.

In a few seconds more the groom brought the prancing animal, holding firmly to the bit while Miss Emily sprang lightly into the saddle. She seemed such a very feather to manage the spirited horse, yet I could not help the thrill of pride as I watched the tiny hands bring her into such quick subjection, and the straight, lithe young figure sitting her seat to such perfection.

The groom stood watching her anxiously down the avenue, but I was not surprised when she had once disappeared from view to see Mr. Arthur leap into the saddle and follow her unseen, he had determined to keep her in sight, and I somehow felt safer to know she was in his charge. Cruel as had been her words, I had her too well to heed them at time.

The afternoon slowly passed away. What was it that caused such a shadow of dread to creep over my heart? Somehow I could not shake it off. From time to time I would steal away from my other duties into my darling's room, where everything so reminded me of her, picking up the articles she had thrown round in her careless haste, and when all was in order, looking for something else to do to detain me in the spot. Yet I would not acknowledge the real extent and reason of my uneasiness, even to myself, until the sound of horses' hoofs rapidly nearing the house suddenly lifted the load I had unconsciously been carrying and brought me with almost a cry of thanksgiving to the window. Yes, there was my darling's blue habit fluttering in the breeze. She had returned unhurt, but the excitement must have been too great for her strength, for, even from where I stood, I could but note the deathly pallor of her face, and hastened down to meet her.

Ere I reached her side I saw two of the men, in obedience to some hastily issued commands, spring into their saddles and ride rapidly down the avenue. Then in another moment Miss Emily lay almost fainting in my arms.

"Oh, Nanna," she exclaimed, "I have killed him, and he will never, never know how dearly I loved him."

From time to time low moans escaped her half-parted lips, and I could but contrast her with the bright, willful girl who stood still and trembling. But Arthur had saved her life by giving his.

I could but comfort the child the best I might, when outside came the tread of feet, and I knew they were bringing their sad burden home. Pressing a kiss on her forehead, I went forward to meet it, but as through my tears I bent to look over the dear face, I, too, almost fainted, though this time for joy, for the great brown eyes were wide open, and I could almost fancy smiling into mine.

The physicians gave us little hope at first, however, and it was pitiful to watch Miss Emily steal in and out of the room where he lay so white and still and suffering. All her old willfulness had gone now, and I could see how her heart was centred in him, but at last we knew the best and the worst. "Life would be spared, but Mr. Arthur would be a cripple for life."

"Through me, Nanna—all through me!" she moaned forth when she heard it. "How he must hate even to look at me!" But I had watched his gaze follow her too often not to know differently.

I was busy one day in his room (I think they scarcely knew I was there) when Arthur called her to his side.

"I want to say something to you, Emily," he began, "something which has been a long time on my mind. You must not reproach yourself for this. You must not let it interfere some day with giving your love to a man more worthy of it, and you must remember no one will rejoice more than I in your happiness."

For a moment she stood still, cheek flushing and paling; then she threw herself at his feet. "Oh, Arthur," she exclaimed, "will you not take me? Have you learned so to hate me that all the old love has gone?"

"Gone," he answered, stroking the bright hair. "Emily, can a man part with that which has become part of his soul? But, my darling, I cannot consent to your tying your young, joyous life to mine."

"Arthur! Husband!" she whispered, softly; then I stole from the room, knowing my presence would not be missed, and sure my darling would win her cause. Nor do I think, in the many happy years which since then have rolled along, leaving me an old woman now, either has ever regretted that for once and the last time Miss Emily had her willful way.—N.Y. Ledger.

Herding Sheep Good for Consumptives.

Another class of men who watch sheep are those who do it for their health. Dozens of men claim to have been cured of consumption simply by putting in several months at watching sheep. The work gives what is most required in the deadly disease—plenty of fresh air, moderate exercise, and employment that is not wearing on the brain, but is still enough to keep it occupied and prevent nervousness. Of course if a man has plenty of money he can get these things without herding sheep, but there are many men who need them badly who have no money, and all who have taken advantage of this knowledge have surely been benefited. A number of men who have taken up sheep herding have become so fascinated with it that they have stuck to it long after they have got over the trouble.—Providence Journal.

Elevator Sickness

Physicians have discovered a new and distinctly modern ailment which they call elevator sickness. It is asserted by reputable medical men that the large increase in the number of brain fever and nervous disorders is due in no insignificant degree to the extension of the elevator system. Most people feel a sensation as if they were falling when going down in a rapidly moving "lift," and the constant repetition of this seemingly slight dizziness induces chronic headache or other nerve disorder and even leads to brain fever in some instances. Those who habitually ride up and down six or eight stories two or three times a day almost inevitably become a prey to some kind of nervous trouble.

Shelling Green Peas.

The chef of a New York hotel has found a new way of shelling peas. He uses an ordinary clothes-wringer. The pods, as they go between the rollers, burst open, leaving the peas behind. The first impression is that the peas would be broken or bruised, but it is said this is not the case. The pods stain the rollers, therefore an old wringer should be used.

BOB WHITE.

Harvest's coming and one hears
O'er the wheat field's ripening ears,
Swaying on their fragile spears
From a bird throat, clear and light:
"Bob White! Bob White!"

Grateful waves of faint perfumes;
Here are rosy cockle blooms,
Blue-grass panicles, soft plumes,
Dew-bespangled, charming sight.
"Bob White! Bob White!"

Low the hawk, marauding, sails;
Frightened, slip the sleek, young quails
Through the stake-and-rider rails.
Again a call, that cheery pipe:
"Bob White! Wheat ripe?"

Blood-red in the bronze-trunked trees
Cherries, good marillas these,
Ideal cherries, if you please,
Answering fifing of Bob White:
"Not quite! Not quite!"

In the orchard apples green,
Color of the leaves are seen.
Here a prize, a windfall found,
Red-streaked apple on the ground.
Calling, answering: "Bob White!
Wheat ripe?" "Not quite!"

A Medical Warning.

All medical men of large experience have frequently met with cases in which patients have placed a bottle of medicine to their lips and taken a draught of its contents in a dark room, under the impression that there was "only one bottle upon that shelf," when in reality some other member of the family had placed other bottles there. In this way serious cases of poisoning have occurred. In other cases a wife rising in the night to give some medicine to her husband or child has picked up the wrong bottle in the dim light, and administered a fatal dose, with terrible result.

Where medicine is ordered in drops you should always obtain a medicine dropper from a drug store, and avoid attempting to drop the medicine from the bottle, as it requires a very steady hand and accurate counting to avoid mistake.

Finally, let me warn you against one common habit, which is closely connected with the use of bottles containing old medicines, and is strongly condemned by oculists, who most frequently meet with it—the habit of preserving old medicine droppers which have been used for dropping fluids into the eye. Quite frequently powerful medicines dry in these droppers, and when they are used some months afterwards for the introduction of eye washes they produce symptoms which very seriously alarm the patient, and which may to some extent mystify the practitioner.—The Chautauquan for July.

MARY'S LITTLE LAMB.

THE TRUE STORY OF THE HISTORICAL LITTLE ANIMAL.

A Massachusetts Tale That Is Unique in Its Way, Though It May Easily Have a Counterpart Any Day, Barring the Verses.

In the pretty little Massachusetts town of Sterling, or as it was called by the Indians, Woonschauxet, which at one time formed a part of old Lancaster, in the county of Worcester, Mary E. Sawyer was born on the 22nd of March, 1806.

Her ancestors, the Sawyers, the Prescotts and the Houghtons, were among the first settlers in the town and from this stock many eminent men have descended, among them being the historian, Prescott. Her father, a son of an officer in the Revolution, was a hard working, matter-of-fact farmer, who was noted for his dislike of Torys, while her mother was a gentle and loving woman of the old New England type. The old homestead in which Mary was born was built by Thomas Sawyer, and was a one storey and a half wooden building that set back a little from the main road. In front, just across this thoroughfare, was the well with its old-fashioned sweep, while at the left on the other side of a cross road stood the barn to which had been built a good-sized shed, and extending from this shed was the sheep pen.

The red stone schoolhouse which Mary and her brother and sisters, as well as the other children in the district, attended, was situated on the other side of the road leading from Sterling to the parent town of Lancaster, on Red Stone hill, distanced about a quarter of a mile from the Sawyer farm. The teacher of this school at the time of the lamb adventure was Miss Polly Kimball, mother of Mr. Loring, proprietor of the well-known Loring circulating library of Boston.

The famous verses entitled "Mary Had a Little Lamb," was told by the heroine of the story as follows:

"The lamb episode occurred in the village of Sterling, near Worcester. I was always very fond of animals, and from the time I could toddle out to the barn, I was with the dumb animals not a little of the time. One cold, bleak, March morning I went out with father, and after the cows had been fed we went to the sheep pen, and found two lambs which had been born in the night. One of them had been forsaken by its mother, and through neglect was about dead from cold and for want of food. I saw it had a little life and wanted to take it into the house, but father said no; it was about dead anyway, and at the best could live but a short time. But I couldn't bear to see the poor little thing suffer, and I teased until I got it into the house, and then I worked upon mother's sympathies. It could not at first swallow, and the catnip tea I had mother make for my very sick friend it could not take for a long time. I got the lamb warm the first thing, which was done by wrapping her in an old garment and holding her in my arms beside the fireside. All day long I nursed the lamb, and at night it could swallow just a little. But I wasn't then satisfied it would live and I sat up all night with it, fearing it wouldn't be warm enough unless there was some one there to look after its comfort. In the morning, to my girlish delight, it could stand; then it improved rapidly, soon learned to drink milk, and from the time it could walk about it would follow me anywhere if I only called it. We roamed the fields together, and were, in fact, companions and fast friends.

"The fleece of the lamb was of the finest and whitest, and I would comb it every day and tie the wool with bright ribbons and dress it up in pantaletts and a shawl. The day the lamb went to school I hadn't seen her previous to starting off, and not wanting to go without getting her, I called. She readily recognized my voice and soon I heard a faint bleating way down the field. More and more distinctly I could hear it, and I knew my pet was coming to meet me. My brother, Nathaniel, said: 'Let's take the lamb to school with us.' I thought it would be a good idea, and I consented, and she followed along right ous, fretful useless, helpless, irritable, woman makes her husband miserable. If he is a good-tempered, good man, he tries to soothe and comfort her. If he is only an ordinary man, he swears and gets drunk. Few men realize what it is that makes a woman cross, fretful, and nervous. If they did, they would see to it that their wives took proper care of the health of the organs distinctly feminine, and resorted to the proper remedy to make them strong and healthy in a womanly way.

The best medicine for nervous, fretful, irritable women is Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. It goes to and corrects the cause. It acts directly on the feminine organism and restores it to natural health and vigor. It soothes inflammation and corrects all weakening drains. It will make a sick woman well, and a fretful, cross woman happy and amiable. It prepares a woman for the duties of motherhood, and taken during the expectant period makes baby's coming easy and almost painless. Women who wish to know more about this great remedy should write to its discoverer, Dr. R. V. Pierce, chief consulting physician to the Invalids' Hotel and Surgical Institute, at Buffalo, N. Y.

Mr. S. J. Bartlett (Teacher), of Granger, Sweetwater Co., Wyo., writes: "Dr. Pierce: I desire to certify that your 'Favorite Prescription' is a boon and a great help to all females. My wife has used your medicine. Prior to taking it, she was constantly troubled with female weakness and monthly, and frequently oftener, irregular flows that incapacitated her for the labors incident to raising a large family. She is now well."

Whoever would find a conclusive answer to the problem: "How to be well" should send to World's Dispensary Medical Association, Buffalo, N. Y., for a copy of Doctor Pierce's Common Sense Medical Adviser. This book is all that its title implies. It uses no technical terms. Its 1,008 pages of graphic explanation and carefully correct illustrations make it a treasure for any household. Its 90 pages especially relating to women are worth many times its original price, which was $1.50. There is now ready a large edition to be given away. Send 31 one-cent stamps, to pay for customs and mailing only, and you will receive the book in paper covers absolutely FREE. You may have it in cloth covers for 50 stamps.

MRS. MARY E. TYLER.

Sawyer taught school in Fitchburg, Mass., and later became matron of the McLean Asylum in Somerville, where she made many friends, and entered upon a sphere of great usefulness. One lady speaks of her thus: "Her skill in housewifery told of the olden days, and her gentle touch with the sick or the disordered mind made her truly an angel in the house."

Here she met Mr. Columbus Tyler, the honored steward of the institution, and they were married in 1835 in the parlor of the old homestead at Sterling. During her sojourn at the asylum, a period of some thirty-five years, she interested herself in many outside affairs and was one of the women who were instrumental in raising funds to complete Bunker Hill Monument, and she was very active in the Sanitary Fair held for the soldiers in the civil war. She and her husband were among the first founders of the Unitarian Church in Somerville. Having no children of her own, she was always interested in the young, and was seldom, if ever, when in their own home, without some young person with her, and she allowed the neighbors' little ones to ramble at will through her beautiful house and grounds. In reference to children she said to the writer: "If one wishes to keep young in spirit they must associate with the young, and be interested in them." This fact was exemplified by the loving care with which she superintended the infant class in the Sunday school, till Tally Sticks.

That tally sticks were at one time pretty general may be concluded from the derivation of the word score. In its original significatio a "score" is a "scar," a cut made in a counting stick. So also a "tally" is derived from the French taille.

The Roman numerals are derived from scores. They were mere notches cut in wood originally. The V for five was a rude representation of the outspread hand, and the X in like manner symbolized all ten fingers; the IV. was a comparatively late innovation; originally the IV. was represented by four strokes, or notches as in clock dials.

The old Celtic alphabet—the Ogham writing—was of very similar and identical, nature. It consisted of notches cut at the corner of a square stone, or else from a stem line. The letters B, L, F, S, N, are formed by cutting strokes at right angles to the stem line of the right hand, and the letters H, D, T, C, Q, by strokes at right angles to the left. Thus, a single stroke to the right is B, and to the left is H, two to the right is L, and the same number to the left is D. Three to one side is F, three to the other is T. Long strokes, numbering from one to five, cutting the stem diagonally, expressed M, G, Ng, St, R, and short strokes, numbering from one to five, cutting across the stem at right angles, give the vowels.

It is easy to see that the tally stick was used for numbers before the alphabet was thought of by our Celtic forefathers. Having proved the tally stick valuable for accounts, they applied it for writing messages on rods and memorials on tombs.

The old Runic staves for calendars were somewhat similar. Strange symbols were introduced to mark the several festivals, but the days were indicated by notches.—Chambers' Journal.

SCOTT & BOWNE, Belleville, Ont.

The secret of Macaulay's boundless acquirements was his quick, almost intuitive, discernment, and his extraordinary memory. "To the end he read books faster than other people skimmed them, and skimmed them as fast as anyone else could turn the leaves." His intellectual appetite was prodigious, and it was far from being nice about the pabulum set before it. Along with the best works of genius was devoured the most miserable trash. And it mattered not what it was—Shakespeare or Mrs. Meek—it was never forgotten. Two pieces of rhyme read in a provincial newspaper as he waited in the coffee room at Cambridge for the post-chaise, forty years afterward he could recall word for word. One afternoon, visiting at a friend's house with his father, he discovered on the table, "The Lay of the Last Minstrel." While the elder Macaulay talked, the younger was busy with the poem. He had no more than time to peruse it once, but coming home he was able to repeat to his mother several cantos of the work. Once when going over to Ireland he beguiled the monotony of the sea passage by reading over from his memory as from a book the first half of "Paradise Lost." He made the boast that, if by any chance "Paradise Lost" and "The Pilgrim's Progress" were destroyed, he would undertake to reproduce them from recollection.

The New Orchard Pest.

Prof. M. V. Slingerland of the Cornell University Agricultural Experiment Station has made a study of the new orchard pest, and says that the "pistol case bearer" is more destructive than any of the "case bearers" ever known. He believes it to be an American insect. In Pennsylvania it has already destroyed 8000 trees, and has now made its appearance in New York. Its range of food plants includes orchard fruits and probably the chestnut. It occurs from Canada southward, through New York and Pennsylvania, where only it has been destructive, and westward through Nebraska into New Mexico. It is very small and would hardly be noticed except for the "cases" which the little caterpillars wear, and which reveal them to the casual observer. Their form is pistol-shaped. They are tough, leathery texture, apparently made from silken threads, interwoven with pubescence from leaves. These little cases are odd looking little objects, and are seen projecting from flower buds, leaves or twigs. It is doubtful if any spray will reach the insect in its winter quarters. —Chicago Inter Ocean.

Bought a Town and Moved It Six Miles.

Every now and then marvelous stories come out of the West. One of the most remarkable is told by a Missourian. It is a story of the days when the people of the Bullion State were driving out of it the Mormons. The latter built a town at Nauvoo, on the banks of the Mississippi. There they erected their temple and were making much progress, until the people of Illinois arose in anger, burned the temple, murdered Joe Smith, and drove the rest of the community to take final refuge in Utah. Afterward a colony of Russian colonists came along and bought the land. They had no use for the 350 buildings, and sold them to a Missourian for a trifle. The following winter this enterprising individual put rollers under the houses, slid them down the banks of the frozen river, and then slid, rolled and pushed them six miles further up the stream, where, alone and single-handed he founded the town of Fort Madison, Ia.—Oregonian.

Turning Iron Sands Into Steel.

A means has been found of turning the iron sands of Taranaki, in New Zealand, into commercial iron and steel. The sands extend over forty miles of beach, many feet deep, and near. They out 300 yards below low water are entirely free consist of magnetic iron perfectly from sulphur, phosphorus and other impurities, except a small percentage of titanium. Cheap coal can be had not far away, and lime and clay are near by. Hitherto all attempts to utilize the iron have proved futile. By the new method bricks made of 160 parts of iron sand with fifty parts of yellow clay and fifty parts of blue clay are put in the furnace with briquettes made of coal breeze, raw bituminous coal, slag cement and coal tar.

Tomato Catsup.

Select nice ripe tomatoes, mash them to a pulp in a clean butternut with the hand; cover, and let stand to ferment three days, stirring it each day. Then rub the tomatoes through a sieve, place the strained tomatoes over the fire, and boil without a cover to a creamy thickness; then measure them; add to each gallon of catsup half pound sugar, half cupful of salt, half pint vinegar, one teaspoonful extract of cloves, two teaspoonfuls of ground mace and one-half scant even teaspoonful cayenne pepper; boil ten minutes, then bottle.—New York Press.

thought it would be a good idea, and I consented, and she followed along right behind me.

"When the schoolhouse was reached the teacher and not arrived, and but few scholars were there. Then I began to think what I should do with the lamb while school was in session. I took her down to my seat—you know we had old-fashioned, high, boarded up seats then. Well I put the lamb under the seat, put on her blanket and she laid down just as quietly as could be. By and by I had to go out to recite and left the lamb all right, but in a moment there was a clatter, clatter on the floor, and I knew it was the pattering of the hoofs of my lamb. The teacher laughed outright, and of course all the children gigged. I took the lamb out and put it in a shed until I was ready to go home at noon, when it followed me back.

"Visiting the school that forenoon was a young man named John Roulstone, a nephew of the Rev. Samuel Capin, who was then settled in Sterling, and with whom the young man was preparing to enter Harvard College. Young Roulstone, who died of consumption before the end of the freshman year, was very much pleased with the school incident, and the next day he rode across the fields on horseback, came to the little old schoolhouse and handed me a slip of paper, which had written upon it three verses, which are the original lines, but since then there have been two verses added by a Mrs. Hale.

Mary had a little lamb,
Its fleece was white as snow;
And everywhere that Mary went
The lamb was sure to go.

It followed her to school one day,
Which was against the rule;
It made the children laugh and play
To see a lamb at school.

And so the teacher turned it out,
But still it lingered near,
And waited patiently about,
Till Mary did appear.

"The death of my pet took place on Thanksgiving day.

"We were all out in the barn, where the lamb had followed me. It ran right in front of the cows fastened in the stanchions that extended along the feed box. One of the cows threw gave its head a toss, then lowered its horns and gored my lamb, which gave a piercing agonizing bleat and came toward me with the blood streaming down its side. I took it in my arms, placed its head in my lap, and there it bled to death. During its dying moments it would turn its little head, look up into my face in a most appealing manner, as though it would ask if it could. If there was not something that I could do for it. It was a sorrowful moment for me, for the companion of many of my romps, my playfellow of many a long summer's day, had given up its life, and its place could not be filled in my childish heart."

Mrs. Tyler speaks of a Mrs. Hale adding several lines to the three original verses, and someone, at one time, claimed the whole poem for Mrs. Hale, but we trust that this narrative, as told by Mrs. Tyler, may settle the authorship. A letter received recently from a nephew now nearly seventy years of age, writes of having "not only Aunt Mary, but his grandmother and Uncle Nat, tell him the story when a little boy, and his Uncle Nat was the one who showed him where the lamb was found by Aunt Mary." The nephew says, "We went to school where Mary and the lamb went, and as we remember the fun-loving brother Nat, we can easily understand his suggestion."

To all who knew Mrs. Tyler, not a doubt would enter their minds of the authenticity of her story, though during her life, with her characteristic modesty, she would not countenance any controversy, but did at one time at the earnest solicitations of a correspondent of the

He Understood.

The professor of mechanics at an English college records that he once gave a lecture upon the locomotive, and was particularly struck by the absorption of one juvenile listener. He spoke to this student after the lecture, and asked him, "Well, I suppose you understand all about the locomotive now?"

"Yes," was the reply, "all but one thing."

"And what is that?" said the professor kindly.

"I can't make out what makes the locomotive move without horses."—Tid-Bits.

A Belleville newsboy found his way unobserved into the gallery of the hall in which the Grand Lodge of the I.O.O.F were conferring the grand lodge degree. Big-man-from-up-the-creek scared the boy out of a week's growth and when he got through with him the little chap couldn't even remember his own name. As there were no axes in the hall they decided to let the boy live. His explanation is as follows:—"Fellow told me that a man with a trick coat was givin' a show. I went to the door an' didn't see nobody takin' tickets, so I walked up into the gallery." He went out on the run.

Scot's Wha Hae.

The children, grand children and great-grand-children of the late Wm. Scott held their annual picnic on the "old playground" on the farm of Mr. Sidney Scott, Newburgh Road, on Friday, Aug. 20th. This is the old Scott homestead and the gathering must have brought to the minds of the older ones many pleasant and sad reminiscences of by-gone days. The following is a list of those in attendance:—Mearl Sills and wife, H. J. Abbott and wife, Miss Lielly Abbott, Miss Annie Abbott, C. Wilson, Oshawa; Mrs. Ezra Huffman and Master Herbert, Miss Rosa Jackson, Miss Rhoda Jackson, Miss Maud Loucks, Master Blake Scott, Master Roy Scott, Miss Mary Wilson, Miss Maud Scott, Master Robt Scott, E. W. Scott and wife, Miss Florence Scott, Master Harry Scott, Master George Scott, Miss Belle Davis, Miss Addie Scott, Miss Otta Sills, Miss Nellie Sills, Miss Margaret Abbott, Miss Catharine Abbott, Miss Maud Scott, F. S. Scott and wife, Master Harry Scott and Miss Myrtle Scott, Campbellford; J. M. Smith, Ibra Sills and wife, Elias Smith and wife, Miss Leora Smith, Master Fred Smith, Mrs. Norman Scott, S. E. Scott and wife, Marsh Davis and wife, Frank Wilson and wife, Mrs. Dorland Jackson, Milton Jackson and wife, Irvine Parks and wife, Rev. David Wilson, A. G. Scott and wife, Miss Edith Scott.

This was the day on which Matthew Scott celebrated his birthday. Football, baseball, quoits target shooting, and other games were indulged in, and it is said of the venerable Rev. David Wilson that he kicked the ball almost as good as any of them. The picnic plot of the Scott family is on historic ground, it being near the site of the old camp ground of fifty years ago. It is needless to add that there was edibles in abundance at the picnic nor that Sidney Scott was kept busy for a time freezing ice cream. It was truly a unique and pleasant gathering and we hope that everyone present may long be spared to attend these re-unions.

DEAR SIR:

On the 25th of Jan'y last the trustees of the Huron Public School, having doubts as to the economy in using your coal in their building, put in one ton of Scranton coal, and weigned up one ton of your coal. We have two furnaces exactly alike, both having the same number of rooms to heat. Your coal was to be used in the furnace that heated the North rooms. I give you the result, number of pounds burned each day, &c.

Killed at the Crossing.

John Arnold, a young man in the employ of Mr. John Hambly, North Fredericksburgh, was instantly killed at Mooney's crossing on the G. T. R., on Saturday night last. He and the fourteen year old son of the late Fred Fitzmartin were returning from Napanee. It is presumed that when they reached the crossing they waited for a west bound freight to pass, but did not observe that an east bound freight was also approaching. After the west bound train had passed they drove across the track and their rig was struck by the east bound train. Both the occupants were pitched headlong from the buggy and Mr. Arnold landed in the culvert. His skull was crushed in and death must have been instantaneous. Young Fitzmartin was seriously injured about the head. He has so far recovered as to be able to be out and around. He remembers nothing of the occurrence and the shock has affected his brain, if it has not dethroned his reason. Strange to say the horse escaped uninjured, although the buggy was completely demolished. The animal was discovered grazing by the wayside by the son of Mr. Harvey Vankoughnett, of Napanee, who was returning home. He recognized the animal as belonging to Mr Hambly and notified Mr. Hambly as he was passing the house. Mr. Hambly investigated and found the remains of the unfortunate young man and had them conveyed to Paul & Ming's undertaking establishment. The remains were taken to his father's residence, near Roblin, and interred on Monday. Deceased was about 22 years of age and a quiet, steady, industrious young man. He was highly esteemed by his employer, and respected by all his acquaintances.

The Addington Liberal Convention.

The Addington Liberal Convention held at Sharbot Lake on the 18th inst., was an enthusiastic and well attended meeting. Delegates were present from all parts of the riding and the spirit exhibited by the Reformers is a happy augury that Addington will be redeemed to Liberalism when the opportunity presents itself.

The meeting was called for the purpose of selecting a candidate to contest the riding in the provincial election. The discussion and ballotting brought forward the names of a number of prominent Liberals anyone of whom would have made a worthy representative. The names of Mr. H. M. Deroche, Q. C., and Dr. Jno. Vrooman, were mentioned in this connection, but the former could not see his way clear to accept the nomination if tendered to him, and the latter was unavoidably absent from the convention. Messrs. Edward Perry and M. B. Mills were also mentioned as candidates. Dr. Coutlee, a prominent citizen of Addington, and a rising young medical man, was tendered the nomination, and accepted it.

Dr. Coutlee is a man of pleasing presence, good address, and energy, and we feel confident he will carry the banner of liberalism to victory in the next provincial contest in Addington.

After the nomination stirring addresses were delivered by Messrs. H. M. Deroche, Q. C., Dr. Coutlee, Edward Perry, M. B. Mills, and G. W. Dawson, Liberal Organizer, and others. Resolutions of confidence in the Goverments of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Hon. A. S. Hardy were passed after which the meeting disbanded with three cheers for Dr. Coutlee and the Queen.

I am asked all kinds of questions every day about coal, particularly this that bears the attractive name of the People's Coal. It was not my intention to advertise this article for the parties selling it by referring so to it in any way because as a rule to decry an article of this kind only makes people more anxious to try it, but so much is being said that is so far from the truth that I feel that in justice to myself as a coal merchant, selling the best variety of coal imported into Canada, I should to some extent defend my trade, by stating some facts in the matter. The first I knew of what is now called "The People's Coal" was in the year 1895. Previous to that it had been sold for steam purposes only and when it proved a failure for that purpose it was offered as a domestic coal and went by the name of Royal Stock. The agent of the company, Mr. Jas. McCleannan, tried hard to sell me some of it, offering it to me at 75c. per ton less than I could buy Scranton for at that time. He admitted it was not as good as Scranton but claimed it was worth within 75c. per ton of it, although I think he knew better. But I declined to have anything to do with it. The following season, 1896, it was on the market again, but owing to its not having given satisfaction the previous season the name was changed to Bernice and under this name some new business was secured and as the change of name did not improve the quality of the coal another new name, as I must admit, a more attractive one, was selected for 1897, viz: The People's Coal. There is no doubt but what it will be some people's coal but I think there will be some people who will wish the Lord it was some other peoples instead of theirs. Now Mr. Vanluven publishes a comparison and of course goes the whole hog by testing it with what he hears everyone say is the best coal in the world viz, "The Scranton Coal" and as would be expected Scranton is not in it. As usual his testimonials are from some one a long way off and we all know the price of such varies from a glass of whiskey to a quart flask, so are not hard to get. Now I should like to make a list nearer home and as winter is drawing near, when the poor of our town could appreciate anybody's coal, I will invite Mr. Vanluven, or the gentlemen who own the mine, which produces the coal he sells, to test their coal with "Old Scranton" and if it proves to be equal to it, I will donate five tons to the deserving poor, and if it does not they are to give the same quantity, though I think they should make their's ten tons in order to give the poor the same value as they would have in five tons of Scranton. If my challenge is accepted of course the poor will burn People's Coal in which case they can rest assured they have a winter's job and if it is only shovelling coal and carrying ashes they are better at that than being idle. In conclusion I wish to add a few testimonials to the one already given by Mr. Vanluven. I am not positive whether it was during the season of 1895 or 96 I met Mr. McCleannan and he said he was on his way to Tweed, and had shipped a car or two of coal there for the N. T. & Q. Ry. to try and he was going out himself to ride from there to Kingston in the engine to see the coal was thoroughly tested" and an employee of the railway told me after that although Mr. McCleannon was off the engine at every station picking chips and stripping cedar bark off the fences he could not keep up steam and they had to abandon the use of his coal.

I had also heard that Messrs. Folger Bros., of Kingston had tried it on their steam boats and as I knew that they had previously burned Scranton, I called on them a few days ago to enquire if they had tried to use the People's Coal on their boats, when they assured me they had and that it had proved a failure. They said they could use it on short runs by pulling out their fires, cleaning out the flues and building a fresh fire for the return trip but they could do nothing with it on long trips on account of it making so many ashes and choking the drafts. I met Mr. McCleannan on another occasion last summer when he told me he was going to move to Peterborough and his son was going to open a yard there and sell people's coal, and from the way he puffed his goods I thought he would roast all Peterborough with it. From the testimonials I received from there he appeared to have roasted a good few. The following is a copy of a letter received from my Bro. Fred.

Peterboro, Aug. 21st, 1897.

Dear Bro. Chas.—Yours of 20th to hand to see many of those who tried it as I am leaving for Toronto on this afternoon train but I will be back on Saturday next when I will send you another list. I did not see personally but I am told your old friend Mr. Clurton put in ten tons of it last fall and he said it was one half gone when he should not have burned more than three tons of good coal and that he had the balance taken out. Gough Bros., dry goods merchants tried a ton of it. They said they started their furnace and filled it with that coal and went out for a few hours and when they returned it had burned out and the house was as cold as a barn. My neighbor used it but did not like it. He used one ton more coal than I did and had a pile of ashes three times as large. Mr. S. Ray, "Tobacconist," used one ton the beginning of the season. He could get scarcely any heat. He had to keep his draughts all open to get it to burn then it burned away very rapidly and made a great quantity of ashes and was very dirty and dusty. He says he would willingly pay $1 per ton more for good hard coal. Mrs. Lush "bakeress" used one ton and consumed it in eighteen days in her oven. She then bought a load of good coal and it lasted twenty-eight days, keeping up the same heat. Mr. Miller, leader of the 57th Band, tried it the first part of the winter. He says he could get no heat from it except it was burning rapidly, when it would burn out quickly and complained of it being dirty and dusty and says he would pay $2.00 more per ton for good coal than he would pay for that. Mr. Cox, of Cox & Co., hardware merchants, used some of it in both his furnace and cook stove and consumed from ½ to ¾ more than of hard coal to get the same results. He also complains of it being very dirty. Mr. Butland, "dentist" tried some of it and says the same as the others about it.

They took in quite a lot of it here last season and pushed it hard, but I understand they are not putting in nearly so much of it this season as it is about played out here. They say they rush it hard the first season wherever they go. They are selling for $6.00 here and good hard coal is bringing $6.50. Will write you again on Saturday. Yours affectionately

FRED.

After all this I would not attempt to persuade anyone to not use it as I think they will want to try it anyway. But take my advice and try ½ ton first. You will know then if you will want more or not.

Yours truly,

C. E. BARTLETT.

ONE HONEST MAN

DEAR EDITOR—Please inform your readers, that if written to confidentially, I will mail, in a sealed letter, particulars of a genuine, honest, home cure, by which I was permanently restored to health and manly vigor, after years of suffering from nervous debility, sexual weakness, night losses and weak shrunken parts I was robbed and swindled by the quacks until I nearly lost faith in mankind, but thank heaven I am now well, vigorous and strong, and wish to make this certain means of cure known to all sufferers. I have nothing to sell and want no money, but being a firm believer in the universal brotherhood of man, I am desirous of helping the unfortunate to regain their health and happiness. I promise you perfect secrecy.

THE COAL QUESTION.

Peterboro, Ont, Sept 1st, '97.

Mr. F. E. Vanluven,
Napanee, Ont.

DEAR SIR.—Your favor of the 28th received and also copy of the "NAPANEE EXPRESS" newspaper, in which is a letter from Mr. C. E. Bartlett. You ask me to give you some information regarding the statemente made therein. I presume the easiest way to do so would be to take his letter and answer his statements as they appear.

1st., he says that in 1895 he first heard of the People's Coal. The statement may be correct but certainly shows his ignorance of the coal business for the Company have been selling coal for years in Canada. They established their own office in Hamilton in 1889, in Toronto in 1895, and previous to '95 had their own offices in a number of towns in Western Ontario. As to the statement that I offered to sell him the People's Coal in 1895, this is not correct, for at that time and some years previous I was selling Lehigh Valley Coal; and in my ignorance of the good qualities of the People's Coal I was like Mr. Bartlett, abusing their coal. In the fall of '95 I out of curiosity bought two tons of coal from the People's Coal Co. which I burned in the furnace of my house on Yorkville Ave, Toronto, which converted me to the fact that when I abused the coal I was stating what I could not substantiate for the coal proved equal to, and even better, than the coal I had heretofore been using. In the winter of 1896 I made a proposition to the State Line and Sullivan R.R. Co. (the Miners and shippers of this coal) to travel for them. They accepted my proposition. In the spring of 1896 Capt. Carter of the Rathbun Co. knowing that the Lehigh Valley Railway Company were using our coal on their engines wrote the Company asking for prices on our Mine Run Coal and we shipped the Rathbun Company five cars to try on the Napanee and Tweed railway whose engines are fitted for burning bituminous coal and not anthracite coal unless they made changes in their fireboxes, same as the Lehigh Valley Ry. had done which would prove too expensive. Mr. Sherwood will bear me out when I make the statement that there is no similarity whatever between our domestic sizes and our Mine Run coal. The fact is, the Mine Run we sell for less than half you are paying for your coal. It was the Mine Run that was tried on the Folger's boats but Mr. Fred Folger used our Domestic sizes in his furnace in his house and told me it gave him excellent satisfaction.

Now, with regard to the test which you published, and which was made at Brockville school last winter, signed by Mr. Jno. Smith the engineer in charge who made the test and letter signed by Mr. J. Minish, chairman of the supply committee of the public school board. This is correct. Mr. Bartlett tries to answer or explain away this testimonial with the cruel weapon of insinuation by saying that these testimonials were bought or procured with the help of a quart of whiskey. The position Mr. Minish holds in Brockville, being foreman of the Grand Trunk Workshops, honored by the people of the town of Brockville in being elected member of the public school board and still honored by the board in being made chairman of the supply committee, is the last man in the world to be bought by either a glass or quart bottle of whiskey and I ask Mr. Bartlett to place himself in Mr. Minish's position how he would like his children to be taunted with the remark that their father was bought with a glass of whiskey. Truly, "man's inhumanity to man makes countless numbers mourn."

Now Mr. Bartlett says he will come down nearer home to Peterboro and publish a letter signed "yours affectionately, Fred." In this letter he states. "I had not time to see your old friend Mr. Cluxton who put in ten tons of this coal last fall and who states that it was half burned when he should not have burned more than three tons of good coal and he had the balance taken out.

Yours truly,
S. RAY.

Mr. Cox, of Cox & Mix, Hardware Merchants used some of it in his furnace and cook stove, consumed a third to half more to get the same results, complained of it being dirty.

ANSWER.

Peterboro, Aug. 31st, 1897.

People's Coal Co.

GENELEMEN,—"We noticed our name used in the "NAPANEE EXPRESS" in connection with the People's Coal. Now, the truth is we never used a pound of the coal in our store. Our Mr. Cox burns it in his house. When the drivers put the coal in he complained of it not being screened. The Company sent a man to examine it and took out the dirty coal and replaced it with well screened coal. Mr. Cox thinks he burned a little more of it but says it may have been the fault of his furnace."

Yours truly,
Cox & MIX.

The Winding up of the letter signed, "Yours affectionately, Fred," states that they put in quite a lot of this coal last season and rushed it hard. I understand that they are not putting in so much this season as it is about played out here. They rush it hard the first season wherever they go.

Now in answer would say that up to this date in 1897, we have brought into Peterboro more coal than we did during the whole season of 1896, and the best of the coal season is yet to come. The books of the Grand Trunk and C. P. Ry. will verify this statement. We admit that we are not pushing, nor is it necessary for us to push our business as hard this year as it was last. The quality of our coal is known here and it sells itself. You will find next year much easier work to sell our coal.

NEW OFFICES OF THE PEOPLE'S COAL CO.

"The western store of the new grey brick block, erected on Charlotte st., will be occupied by the People's Coal Co., this week. When fitted up and completed the company will have a much more convenient and commodious premises for their growing business where their customers can be better waited upon.

"Toronto Morning World" Aug. 29th '97.

GOVERNMENT COAL COTRACTS.

"The Dominion Government have awarded the Government Coal Contracts to the People's Coal Co. to supply the Customs House, Examining Warehouse, Inland Revenue Department and Post Office here this year. Theirs being the lowest tender and their lorries are now busy delivering the same. This speaks well for this enterprising Company and the quality of their coal as they had the contract for these institutions last year."

If you intend visiting the Toronto Exhibition this year kindly call at our Head Office corner Queen and Spadina, or if you have any friends coming up give them a letter of introduction. We will be pleased to show them our premises and extend to them any courtesies in our power.

As he had no trouble in keeping it going all night, the same as other coal.

The land I travel through is dark
With fears, and cares, and shadows;
No sun to wake the singing lark
Or fill with flowers the meadows;
Myself, alas, my only light,
The sun by day, the stars at night.

O God eternal, Lord of love,
Whose power goes forth in pity
To stir the sleeping fields and move
The clouds from o'er the city,
Breathe on my heart and let me know
The gladness of the way I go.

O let me look on field and sky
In joy and endless wonder,
And love Thee for the lights on high
And flowers that blossom under,
And praise Thee for the fruits of earth
With cheerful toil and kindly mirth.

Teach me to lose myself, and live
In peace with men, their neighbor;
To honor, help, endure, forgive,
And gladly rest and labor;
O touch my heart and string my will,
And all my life with Christ fulfill.

Let echoes of the heavenly praise
Come still through earthly gladness;
The light that lies on lovelier ways
Be but half hid in sadness;
And of Thy grace the unseen power
Lift up with hope my passing hour.

THE INVENTOR OF MATCHES.

Sir Isaac Holden's Yearly Income Was $1,000,000.

Sir Isaac Holden, who died the other day, at the time of his retirement from political life two years ago was the oldest and probably the richest member of the House of Commons, and he was certainly one of the most remarkable men in the United Kingdom. He was born at Paisley in Scotland, in 1807. His origin was very humble, his father being a working miner, too poor to keep him at school. So he was put at work to earn his own living at the early age of 10, when he was made an apprentice to a shawl weaver. But removal from school only stimulated his ardor for knowledge, and he managed to attend evening classes when working as an operative in a cotton mill some fourteen hours a day. His studies enabled him to accept aposition as a teacher, and it was while serving in that capacity that he bestowed upon the world a great benefit, which was, however, a light benefit to him. This was the invention of the lucifer match, which he came upon unexpectedly while making some chemical experiments for the instruction of his pupils. Other men took up the discovery, and he made nothing out of it.

In time he gave up the ferrule and became a bookkeeper with a Yorkshire manufacturing firm. This was the turning point of his life, for, while working at his ledgers and journals his mind went back to his shawl-weaving apprenticeship, and he became interested in the manufacture of woollen cloth, and sought to construct a machine for carding the wool. For years he studied the problem, making many apparently fruitless experiments. All his savings from his salary were given to the enterprise. The friends to whom he confided his scheme looked with little favor upon it. But his perseverance and genius finally triumphed, and he completed and perfected a carding machine which has revolutionized the wool industry of the world. Happily, he secured letters patent upon the invention, and as a result handsome profits soon came to him. He established mills in Yorkshire. He finally creating large centres of industry. He also built several mills in France. For

THE NOBLEST FISH OF ALL.

Well does the angler love the fish
That is squirming in the air!
With dancing eyes
He will view the prize
As it leaps and struggles there.
But there is another toward which his wish
Is turning from day to day;
And dispite ill luck
He will toast the pluck
Of the fish that got away.

He knows that it moves through the crystal cool,
With never a wave to show
The path it takes
Where the minnow wakes
And darts in the sunbeam's glow.
There's many a beauty who left the pool,
The pride of an idle day,
But those we caught
Never hold our thought
Like the fish that got away.

So, here's to the pleasures we might have had
If fortune had proved more true;
For they stand apart
And they cheer the heart
O'er the things we may some day do.
And the disappointment that now seems sad,
As we look on it later, may
Brace our nerves more
For the sport in store,
Like the fish that got away.

CORNS AND BUNIONS.

A Well Thought Article on Their Causes and Their Cure.

The feet are surely pliant members when they can endure the variformed shoes that from time to time compel them into new habits with each new pair put on; yet they rarely rebel or give real trouble unless barbarously neglected. Corns and bunions are more often the result of wearing old shoes than in a wrong selection of new ones. A constant change of footgear inures the foot to variety, and even those who confine themselves wholly to the ready-made article need suffer no ill effects if the will keep their shoe supply as carefully replenished as the rest of the wardrobe.

It is one of the most fallacious of practices to attempt to economize by wearing old shoes about the house, unless they possess all their buttons, have straight heels and soles and are daily brushed and aired, as are their newer fellows. Only in this way may the ankles be continually braced into straightness and the toes allowed to move gently in an almost straight direction. When the foot is thrown out of balance by worn-down heels, the toes, attempting to retain a level position, perform prehensile feats which resemble the action of the forebears some scientists have ascribed to un. Moreover, the combined heat and moisture of the normal foot hardens the leather of the continuously worn shoe into permanent creases, which in turn render the foot extremely sensitive, and a struggling against its hard environment enlarges the joints and causes local distress.—Harper's Bazar.

Human Body as a Mechanical Wonder.

The greatest of machines is the human body. That is the opinion of an engineer who looks at the subject from the technical standpoint.

Who would think that in his eye there is a block and pulley, or "tackle," as the sailor calls it, as complete and efficient as that with which a ship hoists her mainsail? There it is, however, and when you look at the tip of your nose the muscle that moves your eyeball works in it. There are several of these pulleys in the body.

Another clever dodge of Nature is shown in the bones of the face. Accomplished engineer that she is, she always uses the smallest quantity of material sufficient for strength. In making up the bones of the face she wanted a large surface to which to attach the muscles; but, as she didn't wish to encumber us with heads as heavy as an elephant's, she burrowed hundreds of little holes in the bones, called air cells, and thus secured strength, large surface and lightness.

THE Town Council held a secret meeting in W. F. Hall's office on Monday night. The press were excluded from the deliberations and the minutes of the meeting were not, we have been informed, placed upon record. The business under discussion was the need of securing an efficient chief-of-police for the town, and as a result of the meeting the following advertisement appeared in the Toronto Globe on Wednesday :

"WANTED—CHIEF OF POLICE—FOR THE Town of Napanee; applications, with references, stating experience and salary, without fees, received up to September 11th. Address "Town Clerk," Napanee."

That the town requires better police protection is admitted on all hands, but the necessity of the council proceeding about the matter in a secret manner is not so apparent. The members of the council are elected to represent the ratepayers, and in the matter of hiring a chief-of-police we believe the taxpayers should be kept acquainted with their actions. It is to the columns of the local press that the people look for the doings of their representatives, and the action of the council in denying the press admittance to this meeting demands an explanation.

A HAPPY MAN.

"Why are you glad?" I asked a man
Who had a pleasant smile.
"You look as if you'd won in love,
Or else had 'made a pile.'"
It is not love," the man replied
"That makes me feel so fair;
I saw the races, yesterday,
And saw a jockey there."
"A-a! You had a 'tip,' I ween,
Come, tell me, is it so?
What was the stake? How was it that You laid the 'talent' low?"
"I had a 'tip,' 'tis true," he said,
And then he laughed outright,
"But the reason why I am so glad
Is that I didn't bite!"

"Ho! Ho! Ho! Well, Henry ran into the house, got his pea shooter with which he has knocked many a sparrow out of a tree, creeps along the fence till he comes to a board with a knot hole in it—"

"Good! Capital! As I was saying, Tommy got some soft soap in a cup, the little rascal, and began daubing it on the steps of the ladder—"

"That's great! One of the best I ever heard. Henry spread his legs, braced himself, let 'er fly and that ash man let out—"

"Don't. I'll die laughing. The girl commenced to come down and of course—"

"Certainly. The ash man—"

"Her feet flew into the air—"

"I guess you don't care to hear about a boy that's really smart."

"It's very evident that you don't. I was giving you one the best stories—"

"That's the way they all talk. If there's one thing that bores me more than another it is to hear a man eternally blowing about his children."

"O, there are others. You—" also built several mills in France. For many years his income from them was enormous, averaging probably $1,000,000 a year. His French mills were founded in partnership with Mr. S. C. Lister, the famous "silk king" of Bradford, and were situated at St. Denis, Rheims and Croix. He dissolved the partnership with Mr. Lister in 1878, after it had lasted nearly eighteen years, and then the present firm of Isaac Holden & Son was formed.

Mr. Holden entered political life in 1865. On the Queen's birthday in 1893 he was created a baronet. Like many millionaires, his habits were as simple as those of the poorest paid clerk in his employ. Throughout his whole life he had never missed a day's exercise, unless, indeed, he was confined to bed. Eight miles a day was his "constitutional" walk, rain or shine, hot or cold. No matter how busy he may have been, or how many hours he had to work, he always took time for such a walk, and continued to do so even after he had reached the age of 85. To this habit and his abstemiousness at table he attributed the excellent and vigorous health which he enjoyed as an octogenarian. Never could he be tempted to eat meat oftener than once a day—at lunch. Breakfast and dinner were made of fruit and some little farinaceous food. The House of Commons hours have greatly improved in recent days, but in the worst of times they had no terrors for Mr. Holden. Often he was to be seen between 1 and 2 o'clock in the morning as fresh, as gay and as ready for conversation as if it were 12 o'clock in the day. Indeed, he never showed fatigue and never complained of work or worry, remaining as buoyant and energetic in the eighties as a man of 35.

Fear in Animals.

Back in prehistoric times our ancestors probably knew fear as a constant feeling. They fought to defend their lives and homes from one another. With the beginning of agriculture and the domestication of animals, fighting ceased to be the chief object of existence, gentler feelings had a chance to grow, and fear was not so common a state of mind. But we are not in the condition of savage tribes. We do not live in fear ourselves, and we understand that the animals we have domesticated must be treated with uniform kindness. The horse is exceedingly nervous, while cattle do not appear so nervous, and dairymen will tell you that the utmost gentleness is necessary in caring for them. We can reason away most of our fears; neither the wild nor the domestic animals can do so much. The one way to teach an animal to conquer fear is to let him feel that he may trust us. It is the true and only way, for it lends to love—and "perfect love casteth out fear."—Our Animal Friend.

An Eastern Munchausen.

Most of the stories told of seemingly impossible things are usually credited to the west, but they occasionally come across a Baron Munchausen down east. One of the latest of these is Peter Pimpiere, a young hunter just over the Maine line in New Brunswick. His tale is about as follows: Friday afternoon he left home at the head of a party of young farmers for a day's hunt, an eagle's nest on the top of Wally Mountain, eight miles away, being the objective point of the expedition. The two parent birds were captured after a hard struggle and securely tied, claw to claw. The rope holding the birds was passed to Peter, who carried them out to the level edge of the towering rock and sat down on the cord to hold the birds still. Suddenly the eagles screamed and spread their wings and started off with Pimpiere clinging to the rope. For thirty miles they carried him, when the young hunter's hands gave out and he dropped to the ground. Pimpiere was unhurt, but badly shaken up.

"I have had chronic catarrh ever since the war. The disease affected my hearing greatly. There was a disagreeable ringing in my ears which I had attributed to the fact of a shell bursting near me while in an engagement. I used three bottles of Dr. Agnew's Catarrhal Powder and my catarrh has entirely left me. The noises in my head have also ceased. It is a great medicine—so easy and pleasant to apply. I have no hesitation in recommending it as a quick and certain cure for catarrh in its most acute form." J. C. Taylor, 210 N. Clinton Ave., Trenton, N.J.

Adam's apple, if it was once that fruit that brought into the world all our woe, is now a useful organ. It serves as a sort of storage cistern of the blood for the supply of the brain. When the heart sends up too much blood Adam's apple intercepts it; and when the direct supply from the heart temporarily runs short, Adam's apple gives up its store.

One of the most valuable of all the inventions made for our comfort and safety is the perspirative gland. It acts like the safety valve of a boiler, letting off heat when we become dangerously warm. If our temperature rose seven or eight degrees, we would not have twenty-four hours to live. The valve of the sweat gland is therefore obvious.

A Man Is Never Safe While Flirting With Two Women.

"Jim Flumley, where did you get that necktie?"

"Bought it."

"No you didn't 'bought it.' I can tell a store necktie as far as I can see it. That's hand stitched, and that Cupid on the end and them forget-me-nots on the other end are worked in with silk. Nice things to be putting on a young man's necktie, and you never got it over any counter, either."

"Didn't say I bought it over a counter. One of them fakirs sold it to me at the—" Here Jim worked up an artificial cough and looked out across a waving cornfield.

"Ah, Jim Flumley! Went to the circus, did you? And you told me how mad you was because you had to work and couldn't take me, and me believin' you all the time. Now, sir, who went with you to that show?"

Jim squirmed, looked sneaking and tried to explain; "I'll just tell you how it was, Nell. Me and Jennie Tassler eat a philopena and she caught me and asked me to take her to the circus. How could a feller get out of it?"

"Well, she has cheek. I must say. Why, here's Jen now," and the car stopped to take on a buxom girl who greeted the other two cheerily. "Hello, Jim," she said as soon as in her seat. "I see you're wearin' it."

Jim tried to look unconscious and cover the necktie, but Nell was alert and said: "He told me he bought it."

"I like that now," declared Jennie, sharply. "We ate a philopena, he caught me, I made him the tie and then he coaxed me to go to the circus."

Jim, red and perspiring, saw that he was being surrounded by two angry women and hastily beat a retreat to the back seat. After the few vigorous puffs necessary to light his pipe he pulled his hat over his eyes, humped up despondently in the corner and was heard to mutter unconsciously: "Durn a woman anyhow."

HOME PASTEURIZATION OF MILK.

The Mode of Operation and the Utensils Necessary for Operation.

In most large cities one can now obtain milk that is pasteurized on a large scale for general distribution and usually at nominal prices. In smaller towns and isolated homesteads, however, it cannot be secured and must be prepared at home. The practice of boiling milk is not an uncommon one and beneficial but for the increased difficulty of digestion, producing results quite as alarming as any likely to occur from the use of ordinary raw milk.

Pasteurizing accomplishes practically all that boiling does, and that without to any noticeable degree affecting either the flavor or digestive properties of the milk. The process is one that is recommended by the most thorough bacteriologists of this country and Europe.

The accompanying cut shows a simple household apparatus, consisting of four or six bottles made to set in a pail which is provided with a cover. The milk is bottled and the bottles are placed in the pail, which has been filled with water. The whole is then heated to the required degree, about 160 degrees F. at which temperature it remains for 10 or 15 minutes and is then chilled down to 50 degrees as rapidly as possible without breaking the bottles.

A friend of mine has pasteurized successfully by taking any ordinary bottles, filling with milk to the neck or a little below, placing a stopper or cotton batting in the neck, then setting on a thin strip of wood or inverted pie-plate which has been perforated, in a tin

WINTER AND SPRING.

BOTH MADE BRIGHTER BY SOWING CALCEOLARIA SEED NOW.

Recently This Garden Practice Has Been Growing in Favor—How the Seed Bed Is Made—Treatment of the Young Plants for Success—Enemies.

The public is beginning to appreciate the value of calceolarias as spring-blooming pot plants. They are very interesting in their structure and striking in their general appearance. For early planting the seeds are sown the middle of June, but for April flowering, during which month they should be in their prime, reliance should be had on July sown seed, while to secure a later succession another batch should be put in some time in August.

The seed should be sown in shallow pans upon a light compost with a slight covering of sifted soil, and placed in a cool house, or better, a frame which should be well-ventilated and shaded. If the frame is in a sheltered spot, facing to the north, and a lath screen is used in addition to a shaded sash, which is raised a few inches above the frame, the seeds and future plants will have as nearly perfect surroundings during a hot dry summer as can be secured. As soon as large enough, the seedlings should be pricked out into flats and later into two or three-inch pots, using a rich fibrous compost composed of equal parts of rotted sods, loam, decayed manure and sand. Leaf mold can be added to advantage for the small plants. The plants should be returned to the frame and kept there until November; they will need copious watering, on which account perfect drainage is necessary. The leaves should be kept as dry as possible except that they should have a gentle syringing upon warm, sunny mornings.

The green fly must be kept down at all hazards, as if it gets the start it will be hard to control; to aid in this chopped tobacco stems may be scattered between the pots. As soon as the plants begin to be pot-bound, shift into four-inch pots and later into five or six-inch. They should be removed into a cool house, where they can be kept at about 40 degrees, as soon as there is danger of frost working into the frame, which should be covered up on cold nights with mats during the last month. Keep the plants near the glass, but shade from the direct sunlight.

The early started plants should be established in their flowering pots by

SAVED HIS BOY.

A PLAIN STATEMENT FROM MR. ROBT. McLEOD, OF GALT.

His Little Son Was Paralyzed on One Side, and Doctor's Treatment Did Him No Good—Dr. William's Pink Pills Were Given and Effected a Thorough Cure.

From the Galt Reporter.

Mr. Robt. McLeod is a gentleman well known in the town of Galt and throughout the district. In conversation with a member of the Reporter staff recently, he consented to make public the facts concerning the illness and restoration to health of his little boy. He said:—

"Yes, I believe that had it not been for Dr. William's Pink Pills my little boy would have not been living to-day. Willie, who is ten years of age, was taken with an illness that developed into paralysis of the left side. He had the best medical aid within my reach, but nothing seemed to benefit him. He got so bad that a pin could be run into his left hand to the bone without his feeling it in the least. If he attempted to walk he could only get over the ground by dragging his left foot behind him: he had no power in it whatever. One night I was feeling pretty blue about him. I felt that he was going to be an invalid all his life, and I viewed things in their worst light. On this particular night I put on my hat with the intention of going out to take a quiet walk, but just as I got to the door I saw lying on a step a pamphlet. I picked it up listlessly and saw it was an advertising book of the Dr. Williams' Medicine Co. I only read a few words when the conviction seized me that here was something that might possibly benefit my boy. I at once went down to Mr. Ferrah's drug store and purchased a box of the pills. By the time he had taken two boxes the color had come back into his hand and arm, and by the time he had taken half a dozen boxes he was cured and now he is better than he ever was before in his life, and as hearty and strong as any boy in the town. Yes sir, I believe Dr. Williams' Pink Pills are a wonderful medicine."

item strip of wood or inverted pie-plate which has been perforated, in a tin basin or pail until the milk shows a temperature of nearly 150 degrees. The bottle is then stoppered and the pail and contents are removed to the back of the stove, where the temperature will remain fairly constant for 20 minutes, especially if covered with some non-conducting material, as a cloth or dry towel or the pail cover. At the end of the 20 minutes the bottles are removed and set in warm water, which is gradually cooled and then iced. The bottle may finally be put in the refrigerator after being partially chilled in water.

Pasteurizing may also be accomplished with equally good, if not better, results, in tin vessels, either a double boiler oatmeal cooker or two dishes of suitable capacity, one with a diameter two inches shorter than the other. The water is poured into the outer dish at boiling point, the milk dish and contents being set in at once and the milk constantly stirred until its temperature is 150 degrees. It is then removed for a moment while the water in the outer dish is tempered to the same, or a degree or two higher. The milk is then set back into the boiler, put to one side and closely covered and wrapped in order to retain the heat for 15 or 20 minutes.

The advantage of tin vessels is that they may be plunged from hot water to ice water without danger of breakage, and with positive advantage to the milk.

If the object of pasteurizing be to destroy the bacillus of tuberculosis, a minimum temperature of 140 degrees should be maintained for 15 minutes, or 145 degrees for half an hour.

If milk can be obtained from a herd known to be free from tuberculosis or the person has no fear of this trouble, a pasteurizing temperature of from 135 to 140 degrees maintained for 15 or 20 minutes is sufficient to give good keeping qualities, and to effectually get rid of 95 per cent. of all bacteria, including the forms which produce stomach disturbances, vomiting and cholera infantum in children.

In all pasteurizing work the sudden chilling to 50 degrees, or thereabouts, is imperative. The milk should be kept covered and at as low a temperature as can be obtained. Treated in this manner, pasteurized milk will be found to have a delightfully sweet, pure taste long after common milk has lost its freshness. On the average it keeps from six to 36 hours longer than unpasteurized milk in the same temperature.—F. W. Mossman, in Orange Judd Farmer.

Stable Floors.

We are inclined to think, says Hoard's Dairyman, that there is nothing better for a cow stable floor, in the basement or ground floor of a barn, than a properly constructed concrete or cement floor. It will be durable, and can be kept clean, and will keep out rats.

Plank floors are apt to be slippery, wear out, and frequently rot out, and the liquid is liable to leak through and get under the planks, and be the source of foul odors which will be damaging, not only to the cows, but the product.

Here is a good rule for making concrete stable floors: First, tamp the ground solid where the floor is to be so there will be no settling after it is made. Make the floor six inches thick. The lower four inches should be made of four parts broken stone or coarse gravel, two parts sand and one part Portland cement. The upper two inches of two parts coarse sand—if mixed with some very fine gravel all the better—and one part of cement. In finishing off the floor go over it at the last with a woolen float which will make the surface even, but not so smooth and slippery, as though a trowel were used. When finished in this way the cows will not slip on it, and the bedding will stay on better than if it was smoother.

"I don't take your paper myself," began an irate skinflint, invading the office of The Hawville Clarion, "but I'm told that you published a lie about me in the last issue; an' I tell you right now, that it has to be stopped, or——"

"And we tell you in return, sir," interrupted the able editor, with dignity, "that it was stopped before it began. Your name was not even mentioned, nor will it be till you plank down the cash for a year's subscription. We'll have you understand, sir, that The Clarion will not lie about you nor any other man who is not a paid-up subscriber!"—Puck.

as may be desired. These materials will not bend or spread, and so the oars will move in them always the same, and thus there can be no liability to uneven rowing on account of the locks being of different shapes and angles, as is not infrequently the case with compositions of a softer character. The statement is made that this ball-bearing rowlock affords an ease in rowing which is remarkable.

The Dude's Definition.

"I wonder what they mean by the 'fwinge of society?'" said Gussie, as he lit his forty-second cigarette.

"It must be those fellows that weah theah twousers fwayed at the bottom," said Reggy, after a solemn pause.

And the other assembled members of the Simian Club shivered at the bare mention of such a dweadful thing.

AFTERWARDS.

The Kind of People of Whom This May Truly Be Said.

The evening had been spent in the enjoyment of that delightful form of athletic exercise known colloquially as progressive whist. It had grown late, and the feminine part of the company were upstairs assuming their wraps and reciprocally exchanging the very newest items of information concerning one another and everybody else. The male portion—knowing well from past experience that the time for the next hour or two was all their own—were enjoying a little poker game around one of the small tables. Mrs. Bobbles was among the very first of the young matrons to descend.

"Charlie, dear," she cooed, as she gently patted him upon one cheek, "it's growing very late, and I think we had better be starting for home."

"All right, lovey," replys the smiling Charles, as he hastily scribbles an I.O.U. for $11.40 and hands it over to Youngthing. "I'll be with you just as soon as I can find my hat upstairs."

And as they pass out of the front door, amid the shower of friendly salutations, she leaning upon his strong right arm, and he carefully protecting her from the rude sweep of the night wind, they present a picture of youthful connubial bliss and all that sort of thing well calculated to warp the judgment of the most hardened cynics.

But also and alackaday, I chance to occupy the flat directly above them, and the hot air registers are exceptionally good voice conductors. Upon my return from the same social gathering I hear something like this:

"You miserable little scundrel, you. If ever I catch you looking at that red-haired, green-eyed and lobster-faced Wilson girl again like you did tonight, I'll hire a couple of men to thrash the flirtatiousness out of you! You hear me?

"'And if you ever break in on a game where I'm $14 out, and he'ding my first cards of the evening,'" replies a male voice in excited tones, "'I'll ! ! ! ? ? ? * * * — — — —'" etc., etc., etc.

HEART HOPE.

Raised in an Instant After the Use of Dr. Agnew's Cure for the Heart—A Potent Liquid Remedy—And No Case Too Acute for Immediate Relief and Certain Cure.

"For fifteen years I was a great sufferer from heart disease. All this while I was in the hands of one of our best physicians, from whom the only encouragement I could obtain was that I was liable to drop off at any moment. I had many times read of cures made by Dr. Agnew's Cure for the Heart. Was induced to try a bottle of this cure, and to my surprise the very first dose gave me immediate relief. I felt encouraged and persisted. Before the first bottle was taken the dropsy, which had sorely troubled me, had disappeared, and when I had completed my second bottle I felt as well as I had ever felt," Mrs. John A. James, Wiarton.

Pain in the Back. DEAR SIRS,—I was troubled with pain in the back for months, and after trying several remedies without effect, thought I would use Hagyard's Yellow Oil. I am glad to say that after using two bottles I was completely cured, and cannot recommend this excellent remedy too highly, the first of December, and should be in flower soon after New Year's. During the winter, give ventilation even on cold days, and give attention to the watering so that the plants can by no chance become dry. Keep the moisture of the leaves as much as possible. As soon as the roots fill the pots after the final shift, supply manure, water liberally, but discontinue its use when the flowers begin to open. To avoid disease keep the leaves dry and at once remove and destroy all diseased and decaying leaves.—L. R. Taft, in American Agriculturist.

The Distribution of Plants.

Plants were on the earth long before man. They were distributed by water, winds and other natural agencies. Many seeds are provided with covering suitable for protection against moisture and of the proper character to enable them to float and be deposited long distances from their original home. When plant life had so far developed as to produce blossoms and when animals and insects came the process of distribution was greatly accelerated.

Seeds contain embryonic plants and are largely responsible for propagation of species. Honey locusts and many others spread from roots. Canada thistles spread from underground stems which are not roots. The tiger lily spreads from buds. Ferns are propagated by spores. Some cucumbers when ripening burst open and throw out seeds several feet. The same is true of our wild violets.

The vast number of seeds produced by many of our plants account in a measure for the difficulty in eradicating them. A single seed of chess has been known to produce 600 seeds; a Canada thistle 10,000; a single mullein stalk 600,000 or enough to seed 126 acres counting one seed to the square yard; gympson 151,651; lamb's-quarter 340,658; pigweed 960,902; tumbleweed 1,600,400 or enough to seed 346 acres, one seed to the square yard; another specimen produced 2,350,700 or enough to seed 508 acres, one seed to the square yard.

Foreign weeds appear to be more vigorous and troublesome than our own. The Russian thistle is an example. This is also true in other countries; a foreign thistle has developed wonderfully in the Argentine Republic. Watercress, which will hardly grow in the United States, flourishes luxuriantly in England, so much so that it stops water courses. Horticulturists can well take a lesson from these facts. Undoubtedly many varieties of fruits from outside localities will do well here. Such has proven true in the past and will continue. Many trials will have to be made, however, as out of a large number only a few will prove profitable.—Prof. J. T. Burrill, Illinois.

Facts for Farmers.

Flax is very exhaustive to the soil.

Insure your buildings against cyclones.

Shallow cultivation of corn should be the rule.

Drainage will greatly increase the value of wet ground.

Roots cannot penetrate a subsoil that is as hard as a stone.

The silo will enable the farmer to keep more cows profitably.

In sections where cyclones are likely, a storm cave shows wisdom.

Spare the harrow in the early stages of corn growth and spoil the crop.

The hired man should be a gentleman among the children in the home.

We do not like the barbed wire fence and would not have one while other fencing can be had.

When the surface bakes after a rain, a light harrow should be used, whether the crop is up or not.

Eighty acres, intensively cultivated, are better than 160 acres under the too often loose system of farming.—Western Plowman.

Shortness of Breath. "Since last year I have had serious heart trouble caused by malaria. Shortness of breath, smothering spells on retiring, violent palpitation, etc., often made me gasp for breath. On procuring Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills I found to my surprise and delight that they gave almost instant relief. I got healthy, restful sleep, my heart troubles disappeared, and I now feel very well and strong indeed." Mr. Hugh Moore, Ingersoll, Ont., makes this statement for the public good.

"I was standing beside a Canadian acquaintance, when I expressed a wish to know which point was the north. He pulled out his watch, looked at it, and at once pointed in the right direction. I asked him whether he had a compass attached to his watch. 'All watches are compasses,' he replied. Then he explained to me how this was. Point the hour hand to the sun, and the south is exactly half way between the hour and the figure XII. on the dial. For instance, suppose it is 4 o'clock, point the hand indicating four to the sun, and 11. on the watch is exactly south. Suppose again, that it is 8 o'clock. Point the hand indicating eight to the sun and the figure X. on the dial is due soth.

"My Canadian friend seemed surprised that I did not know this, and, not wanting to be left alone in my ignorance, I asked Henry M. Stanley, whom I met the following day, whether he knew of this simple means of taking the points of the compass. My self-esteem rose when that famous traveler told me he had never heard of it. So perhaps there may be plenty of folks in your country who still remain in my original state of ignorance."—Press Siftings.

The Spirit-World Postoffice.

Psychologically, I've written
Many, many times to you;
But the spirit-world postoffice
Rarely carries letters through.

Countless missives have I posted—
Could you read them!—but it seems
They will never be delivered—
These, our Ibbetsonian dreams.

But the spirit-world postoffice
Has an angel staff, they say;
And a system that is perfect;
And no letters go astray.

And the mind-sent notes returning,
Silently rebuke and cheer;
Make my messages, material,
Stronger, saner, more sincere.

Love-inspired, impulse-driven,
Daily we are piling shelves
Of this office strange with letters,
Higher, lower, than ourselves.

Then the spirit-world postoffice
We will blame not, when we see
That each better soul-sent letter
Is a help to you and me.

Gas Made at Home.

An engine has been placed on the market by a Bavarian firm which enables everybody to make his own gas and to do this without danger, trouble or distress, as the result of the presence of the apparatus. The advantages claimed for this apparatus are as follows: It requires no attention after having been started once, and no special skill to do the latter. The gas produced contains neither sulphur nor ammonia vapors, and is, therefore, entirely non-poisonous, possessing but a weak and not disagreeable odor. No injurious products are developed by its combustion. The engine works very economically, producing only so much gas as is required for the time being. When all burners are closed, it produces only the quantity of gas required for its own power. It is constructed in three sizes, for 15, 40 and 70 flames respectively.

THE OLD-TIME SUGAR MELON.

They're farmin' now by science—ain't like it used to be;
The cotton's growin' diff'runt, an' the corn's ahead o' me;
An' the melons ain't as juicy in the country round about,
For they're raised 'em an' they've raised 'em till they've raised the sweetness out!

They grow 'em now for shippin'; they pack 'em in the trains
An' send 'em off to cities 'crost the mountains an' the plains—
They call 'em "Kolb," an' "Jones," an' "George"—they've named 'em big an' small;
But the old-time sugar mellon was the sweetest one of all!

Thar waren't no style about it; it growed thar in the dew,
An' turned its green sides temptin'ly to sunshine an' to you;
But for these new-fangled melons 'it was more than any match—
'Twas sunny sweet an' honey sweet—the pick of all the patch!

When the hot sun was a-blazin' in the white sky overhead,
An' you found a cool fence corner, 'an you ripped into its red,
An' the sweet juice was a-drippin' from your Barlow's rusty blade—
You talk of honey sippin'—'twas the sweetest ever made!

Ain't nothin' now kin beat it! They may raise 'em fur an' free;
They may call 'em "Stonewall Jackson," "Sam Jones" or "Robert Lee;"
But I'll tell 'em plain an' even—though they're liable to doubt—
That they've named 'em an' reclaimed 'em till they've drained the sweetness out.

QUEEREST OF INTRODUCTIONS.

They Spoke to Each Other and Shook Hands as They Fell.

"Speaking of introductions," said the much-traveled man in the smoker, "reminds me of the queerest one I ever saw or heard of and in which I was one of the principals. I was crossing from Nova Scotia to Boston on a schooner loaded with plaster, a chance that came to me in a country port where I was staying for my health. As the boat saved me sixty miles of stage coach riding to the town of Halifax, where the nearest steamer travel was to be found, I took passage and for ten days was tossed about on a sea voyage that by steamer consumes thirty-six hours.

"There was another passenger—a tourist like myself—and the captain made several desperate efforts to get us acquainted, he knowing us both, but at each attempt before he could pronounce our names he was either called on deck or the ship gave a lurch and the introduction did not take place.

"But one day, when it was so rough outside that we stayed in our bunks in the captain's cabin, and the wind was blowing great guns, the skipper, who had come below for something, stopped to say:

"You two gentlemen ought to be made acquainted. Mr. Smith, Mr. Brown; Mr. Brown, Mr. Smith."

That is the down-east method of introducing people, and as our names were mentioned we each turned in our bunks to salute the other, the bunks being on exactly opposite sides of the cabin.

But at that moment each one of us shot from his bunk as if from the mouth of a cannon, and as we passed at that high rate of speed we caught each other's hand and shook it with a will, and had just time to acknowledge the captain's politeness by saying as we flew past:

"Glad to know you, Mr. Smith."

"Delighted to meet you, Mr. Brown."

GREAT FUN FOR JINKS.

His Experience as Umpire at the Fat-Leans' Ball Game.

"I say, there, Jinks," cried his friend Trix across the lot, "you know the fats are going to play the leans to-morrow, and we want you for umpire. Will you do it? Just for fun, you know. All the old boys will be in it."

Of course, Jinks couldn't do anything else, as "the boys" were going to play, though his wife suggested that he be a trifle cautious.

"You know, dear," said she, "that it doesn't pay to umpire. Don't you remember that Mr. Bobkins was mobbed in the game last year?"

"Oh, dear, Mary, don't talk to me," said Jinks petulantly. "Bobkins didn't know a foul fly from a touchdown. Got to keep a little sporting blood in me, you know. Can't afford to get old too soon. It's easy enough to umpire, if you want to be fair. Any man will get into trouble if he tries to favor sides, you know."

Mary said no more, and the next day found Jinks on the field with golf suit and jaunty cap that set him off wonderfully well.

All went nicely until he called Drinks out at first on a close decision. Drinks marched straight to the home plate shaking his fist, and protesting with all the ardor of a league captain. Jinks wouldn't budge, but felt uncomfortable. Then Drinks called him a thief, next a liar, and later wanted to fight. Friends interposed before Jinks got his coat off and the game proceeded.

All went well until the middle of the seventh inning. The score was 48 to 49 in favor of the fats and the leans were having their inning. Slimkin had gotten in the way of the ball and was on third with one arm in a sling; two men were widespread excitement as to whether he had really made a hit at all. Trix stopped pouting and made for Jinks.

"Any fool would know that was a fair hit," said he with rage.

"Any fool wouldn't run around there like a mad bull and skin his nose on a foul ball like that," replied Jinks contemptuously.

"I never called you a liar, sir," shouted Trix, "you're one yourself. You don't know as much about baseball as a spring calf fed on sweet milk. You ought to be home sewing on buttons. You're a blankety-blank-blank numbskull of a lawyer, anyhow!"

"Look here, Trix, you can't stand there and abuse me. You——"

"Don't you call me any names. I won't stand it. Yes, you did, too. Don't you call me a liar. Take that, and that and——"

There was a pass, an uppercut, a left-hander or two, and it was all over. Jinks' usefulness as an umpire was at an end—and so was the game. They took him home in an ambulance, and the next day Jinks swore out a warrant for Trix, his neighbor, for assault with intent to kill. The fats and the leans were all drawn into court and six family feuds resulted. Jinks got well during the summer, but when his wife wants a new hat all she has to say is:

"Just for fun, you know. All the boys will be——"

PLANS OF A GUILELESS FARMER.

"Sim," said Farmer Sweetmeadow to his eldest son, "me and your maw have made up our minds to let ourselves out as a summer resort for city folks, and if you'll jest write a piece to the paper about it, I reckon we can fill up the spare room, an' the hired man's room, an' the lean-to under the wing. You'll find the inkhorn on the clock shelf, an' you'd better fetch the almanac along so we'll be sure of the day of the month."

"Here you are, paw," said the young man as he squared himself for the effort.

"I'm goin' to call it the 'Sweetmeadow Resort Farm.' Have you got that down?"

"Sure. What comes next?"

"Board by the day or week. Fresh air, fine views."

"They ain't very fillin' pop."

"You jest wait, Sim. Fresh milk and new laid eggs every day."

"Say, pop, where you goin' to get the eggs? Every blamed old hen is a-settin'."

"Let 'em set. Spring chicken on toast."

"But, pop, there isn't a spring chicken outen its shell."

"Never you mind, Sim. Berries three times a day. I reckon your maw canned enough last year to give 'em all a taste.

"Me and Your Maw Have Made Up Our Minds to Let Ourselves Out as a Summer Resort For City Folks."

Homemade bread, sweet corn, green peas, new potatoes."

"He-he-he. If I was you, pop, I'd stick to air and views."

"I mean to, Sim—your head's level. An' they'll have windfalls from the orchard, an' your maw knows twenty-five ways of making apples taste like peaches. I can't think of another advantage. Oh, yes, church privileges within reach."

"Why, pop, there isn't a church in this district."

"I said church privileges. Hunt up your grandad's old bible and put it on the shelf with the family album. Now you start off to town and get that piece in the paper. If the editor kicks about pay ask him to come out to Sunday dinner. And we'll pay off the mortgage, and it will be as good as a circus here all summer. Let your paw alone for money-making schemes." — Chicago Times-Herald.

WON A WIFE WITH AN EGG.

Oklahoma Farmer Made Happy by a Random Love Message.

Ross Williams, of Enid, O.T., wrote a lovelorn message on an egg ready for shipment several weeks ago, and as a result he won himself a bride.

What the young man said on the egg was this:

"On a farm in the Cherokee strip I sit a sad and lonely bachelor, thinking sadly over my fate, and would love to come off the nest and join my life with that of some comely young lady of not too many summers' growth. Should the message on this egg meet the eye of a fair one who is matrimonially inclined on short acquaintance, and who thinks she could enjoy a prairie life with a student of nature's beauty, address Ross Williams, Enid, O."

In due course of time this reply came:

"Dear Mr. Williams—From the quiet precincts of my boudoir I write thee. I am lonely too, and have often longed to quit city life and go West, where the tall, wild grass sways in the wind as if listening to the sweet songs of the chinch bugs. After chopping wood to kindle the kitchen fire, and after the fire was ready for business and the pan was sizzling in the sparkling fat, I was about to break an egg into the pan when, behold! your message met my gaze. It seemed like a dream of a lost, unknown love. Perhaps our fates would trot along well together. But I am comely, but not so fair. Age twenty-three, no money, but plenty of grit. Let us exchange photographs. It may all end in another American union, long to be preserved. Methinks I know you now.—Bessie Carroll, Chicago, Ill."

Further correspondence resulted, and a few days later the young people were married.

For Curing Hiccoughs.

"Why don't you stop that hiccoughing?" said one business man to another as they met at the corner of Fourth and Vine, at the noon hour. The man addressed was all but in convulsions.

"Stop nothing!" said he. "I've been trying every old remedy I ever heard of and every new one that every fool friend was kind enough to suggest. I've held my hands over my head for fifteen minutes and extended them like a signboard until they ached. I held my breath until I was almost ready to drop from apoplexy. I've drunk nine swallows of water nine times over, I guess, and two or three chumps have tried to scare me, and did it, too, but to no good. Then another enthusiastic amateur physician hit me in the middle of the back when I wasn't looking and escaped before I could land on him. I

A DOMESTIC IDYL.

"Now wake me up at 6 o'clock,"
Said he, on going to bed;
"To-morrow is my busy day,
"And I'll get up," he said.

His patient wife, who previously
Experiments had tried,
Said nothing—only looked at him
And softly, sadly sighed.

The night passed on, the morning came,
At six she said, "My own,
"It's six o'clock. You know you said—"
He grunted, "Lemme 'lone."

At seven she gently tried again,
But once again without
The slightest semblance of success—
He only snapped "Get out!"

At eight her courage almost failed,
And turned to wholesome dread.
For as she spoke she had to dodge
A boot flung at her head.

Again she came at nine o'clock,
But gave up trying then;
And he whose busy day it was
Got up at half past ten.

Then came the tide of bitterness
That overflowed her cup;
For he remarked, "What! half past ten?
Why didn't you wake me up?"

CURRIES AND R CE.

Directions to Make a Genuine East Indian Chicken Curry.

The hot weather sugests to the epicure "curries with their rice," East Indian chutneys that should accompany the curries, and mullagatawyn soups, as well as iced sherbets and creams.

Only those men and women who have lived in luxury under the suns of the tropics understand thoroughly how to set a summer table, where the food is the most delicious of its kind, and is scientifically selected to meet the needs of the system in hot weather.

What is needed in summer is a delicate meat diet, but one substantial enough to make up for the wastes of the system caused by heat. To accomplish this end, there should be as little drain as possible on the digestive powers. In winter, when vigorous exercise is taken to keep the body warm, the digestive powers are capable of more wrk. In

NEW DESIGNS IN CURTAINS.

Effective Styles, Entirely Novel in Character, For the Coming Season.

The stylish lace curtains for next season are elaborately decorated with ribbon work. The designs which, according to the dealers, will be most popular are floral, and are very pronounced. When carried out on cream nets with white satin ribbons of various widths the effect is very striking.

The newest curtains have centres of plain, coarse nets, with an edge of lace and an inner border of ribbon work. One pair of curtains whose design is particularly beautiful has an edge of renaissance lace eight or ten inches deep, with an inner border twelve inches wide of Marie Antoinette design, showing long-handled baskets filled with flowers and caught together with bowknots. The baskets, flowers, and bowknots are all worked in cream satin ribbons of various widths. The centres of these curtains are of plain white bobbinet. The design on another curtain is a combination of renaissance, Egyptian, and Marie Antionette styles. The centre is of heavy cream bobbinet with a six-inch edge of renaissance lace. Then comes a strip of the plain net about the same width, followed by a strip of Egyptian insertion about twelve inches wide. Over this strip of plain net and Egyptian insertion runs a floral design worked in satin ribbon whose leaves and flowers are as large as dinner plates.

In curtains of Brussels lace the greatest change is in the plain borders and plain centres. The edges of the new Brussels curtains have plain hems intead of the old-fashioned scallop. The fashionable flowers on these curtains are gigantic pansies and arum lilies combined with maiden-hair ferns.

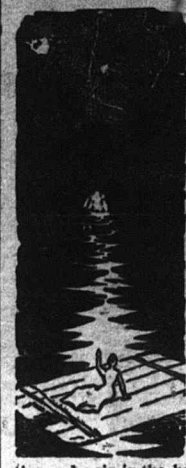
Lace curtains in deep cream promise to be more popular than ever, and there are two new styles, both of French origin. Terera curtains, the handsomest of these, have a centre of plain net almost as heavy and coarse as Russian lace, with a border of a floral scroll design in a lace which appears to be a combination of Royal Battenburg and duchess. The other new curtains have a deep open-work border made up of Brussels lace, Irish point and tambour work. These curtains are quite expensive, and the dealers seem to think their popularity doubtful, owing to the striking contrast between the dead white of the Irish point and the deep cream of the other two laces. Russian lace still holds its own in cream lace curtains. The newest designs have plain lace edges varying in width from several inches to more than one yard.

For bedrooms Irish point and tambour net will take the place of Swiss and the various muslins which for several years have been so popular. These two laces will be much more reasonable in price than heretofore, though apparently the quantity has not been cheapened nor are the designs less pleasing. They are brought out in several entirely new designs, many of which are especially artistic. Japanese silks will be extensively used in bedrooms for curtains as well as draperies. The newest comes of double width in deep, rich colors, with slim grotesque figures of trees, flowers and occasionally animals several feet in height. Plain denim will no longer be used except as a cheap floor covering. In its place comes a double-width cotton fabric resembling corduroy more than anything else. There is als o a double-width cotton fabric in excellent imitation of Bagdad, which is new and cheap and will be much used for bedroom draperies. The new cretonnes are all double-width, with floral designs, brilliant in coloring and gigantic in size.

For portieres and heavier curtains the newest is a heavy silk moire with deep knotted fringe, top and bottom. These curtains come in white and all shades with fringe varying in depth from four inches to one foot. In the various qualities of silk or wool damasks the newest designs are Syrians and Moorish. The figures and colorings are larger and more brilliant than have been used in a dozen or more years. Chenille curtains and portieres have had their day, and there will be no fresh ones on the market in the coming season. Double-faced Bagdad takes the place of the old one-sided drapery of that name, and strange to relate it will be sold for less money. This reduction, according to the dealers, is caused by the Armenian and Turkish troubles. There is a new French portieres fabric of silk and cotton which is very striking and is said to be stylish. The stripes, which run up and down, are very broad and high colored, and are broken at unequal distances by misshapen figures or splotches of unequal sizes. A curtain of this fabric that had but three stripes showed every color of the spectrum and a spot of black and white.

Bead portieres will be used, and the most popular is the style known as "Job's tears." These curtains are made by children in Japan and cost comparatively little, when one remembers that many of them contain more than 80,000 beads. Bamboo curtains, which are

THE STAR OF HOPE.



"I had lost all hope and gone to my father's to die," said Mrs. MOLIE EVANS, of Mound, Coryell Co., Texas. "I gave birth to a baby a year ago, the 8th of June last," she adds, "and seemed to do very well for 8 or 9 days, and then I began to feel very bad, my feet began to swell, my stomach was all wrong and I seemed to suffer with everything that could be borne. I was in bed 5 months and there was not a day that it seemed I could live. We had the best doctors that our country afforded. I was a skeleton. Every one that saw me thought that I would never get well. I had palpitation and pain in the heart, terrible pain in my right side just under the ribs, terrible headaches all the time; a bearing down sensation; a distressed feeling in my stomach all the time; could hardly eat anything and it looked as if I would starve. All the time I would take such weak trembling spells, and it seemed as if I could not stand it. There were six doctors treating me when I commenced taking your medicine. I had lost all hope and gone to my father's to die. I commenced taking Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery and his 'Favorite Prescription' together, and I took them regularly until I felt as if life was worth living again."

"I weigh more than I have weighed for ten years. My friends say that I look better than they ever saw me. The first two bottles did me more good than all the medicine I had taken. My stomach has never hurt me since. I can eat anything I want and as much as I want. If you want to use this in favor of your medicine, I am a living witness to testify to it, and will, to anybody who wants to know further of my case."

LIGHTNING FREAKS.

Queer Things the Subtle Fluid Has Accomplished.

Not far from Hodgenville stands an old house which has a wonderful power for the attraction of lightning. It is in an unused field, surrounded by shrubbery and undergrowth. It is only the frame of a once costly dwelling, and has been standing there for forty years. Strange as it may seem it has been struck by lightning every time an electrical storm has visited that section.

The house was erected by a well-to-do farmer years ago, and was intended for a dwelling for his family, but had to be deserted on account of its habitual subjection to lightning. It has never since been occupied. During a thunderstorm one perpetual flash of lightning plays about the old house. On a dark night and during a storm, a more beautiful scene could not be found. The whole sky and earth around the old house is brightly illumined by the lightning. The house has been torn away strip by strip, with each bolt of lightning, until now only a small portion is left standing. So far as is known no fatalities have ever occurred in the house.—Louisville Post.

Lightning has been very fatal in this section the past month, over eight people having been killed by it. Many strange incidents are related, the most extraordinary being a story from across the Kissimmee River told here to-day. Henry Myers was killed by lightning there last week while in a field and buried the next day. The second day a heavy thunderstorm arose. His grave was struck, the lightning tearing open the grave, throwing the coffin out and breaking it open. It was thus found two days afterward by some relatives and the body reburied. The body was not disfigured by the last electric bolt, but the coffin had been torn to pieces, the body being left on top of the upturned earth with the splintered coffin fragments around it. This is vouched for by several people from that section.—Fort Ogden, Fla., correspondence Louisville Courier-Journal.

Power of the Heart.

The human heart is practically a force pump about six inches in length and four inches in diameter. It beats seventy times per minute, 4200 times per hour, 100,800 times per day and 36,792,000 times per year, and 2,575,440,000—say two thousand five hundred and seventy-five millions four hundred and forty thousand—times in seventy years, which the back when I wasn't looking and escaped before I could land on him. I would not have done a thing to him if I had caught him. But the hiccoughs are here, and to stay, I fear."

"Set 'em up, if I cure you?"

"Will I? I'll set 'em up for a month and throw in a big cold 'bot' besides if you cure 'em."

Then they adjourned to a moistening establishment, and the good samaritan said to Dan, "Dan, give this gentleman a lump of white sugar."

He took it and dissolved it in his mouth, and the hiccoughs went as if by magic, probably because their stay was over anyhow, and not on account of the remedy, but it cost the cold bottle just the same and some drinks besides. Still, he thinks he got out of it cheap enough.—Cincinnati Tribune.

Some Queer Currency.

Boys in the East sometimes think money a scarce enough article, but they really know little about it compared with what some of their cousins from the far West could tell them. There, says The San Francisco Chronicle, one often goes for days without sight of even so much as a nickel, and then the people resort to all sorts of queer devices to make change."

An Eastern man, who had occasion to spend many months in Montana, tells of having seen a man buy a box of matches with a watermelon and receive as change two muskmelons. Another paid for suspenders in turnips and got a carrot or two back with his purchase.

"But of all the queer financial transactions that I have ever known," said he, "the oddest came under the head of 'paying the fiddler.' It had been noised abroad that a dance was to be given a little way up the mountain, and I agreed to go along with one of the boys and see the fun. After going through the elaborate preparations of blacking his boots and putting on a collar, I saw my companion go to the potato bin and select a dozen nice potatoes and put them in his pocket. No sooner had we arrived at the 'music hall' than he gracefully surrendered his vegetables for an entrance ticket. But what puzzled me the most was that upon coming out after dancing all night, he was given two onions as 'change.' I have been trying to make up my mind ever since what that dance was worth in the 'currency of the realm.'"

"I am told your wife would rather cook than eat."

The other man glanced nervously over his shoulder.

"What she cooks, yes," he replied in a hoarse whisper.—Detroit Journal.

Jack—How is your sister getting on with her singing lessons?

Cissie—Well, papa has taken the wadding out of his ears for the first time to-day.—Fliegende Blaetter.

"I just know they talked about me all the time at our club meeting yesterday," said Mrs. Brown.

"How do you know?" asked her husband.

"Because I was the only member of the club absent."—Ohio State Journal.

"Mrs. Gallagher is as fleet as Diana, isn't she?"

"I don't know. All the Dianas I have ever seen were made out of solid rock and weighed a ton."—Detroit Free Press.

Dora—He said there was one thing about me he didn't like.

Cora—What was that?

"Another man's arm."—Life.

If we told you that your baby was starving, that it actually didn't get enough to eat, you might resent it. And yet there are thousands of babies who never get the fat they should in their food or who are not able to digest the fat that they do get. Fat is a necessity to your baby. It is baby life and baby beauty. A few drops of Scott's Emulsion for all little ones one, two and three years of age is better than cream for them. They thrive and grow on it.

SCOTT & BOWNE, Belleville, Ont.

to keep the body warm, the digestive powers are capable of more wrk. In summer the digestion has not such stimulus and there is usually need of stimulants for digestion, such as mustard, curries and varieties of those "hot" or devilled dishes which people unacquainted with the science of the table frequently associate with winter food.

Curries are purely a summer dish, designed for sultry days. Lamb, veal, chicken and rabbit meat are all utilized. A teaspoonful of curry powder added to a pint of a dainty stew of any of these meats converts it into a curry. Persons who have lived in India and other parts of the tropics frequently use curry powder much as we use pepper, sprinkling it from an individual caster over eggs or services of meat. Curry powder is not used as much in this country as in England, where a great many peoples have acquired the taste from residence at one time or another in India.

It is a wholesome taste, and one that offers the stimulus of a change at a season when the appetite often fags. As far as possible the table should be different every season. By serving a variety of dishes in their season, without straining the purse to serve them out of season, the best, most varied and most wholesome table may be regularly maintained.

A bottle of the best English curry powder, which will be sufficient to give many curried dishes, costs but 25 cents. It is, therefore, cheaper to buy it in this way than to make it; but for those who are in the country, far from those city grocers who sell curry powder, a receipt may be of value.

Purchase at a trustworthy druggist's three ounces of coriander seed, three ounces of best tumeric, one ounce each of black pepper, mustard and ginger, half an ounce of cardamon seeds, and one-quarter of an ounce of cumin seeds. This receipt comes from India, and dates back to the days of that famous English gastronome, Dr. Kitchener.

It is still the rule most often used today. Sometimes a quarter of an ounce of cayenne pepper is added to it. Pound the seeds to a powder, and add the other ingredients. Mix them thoroughly, and keep them in a bottle closely corked from the air.

To make a genuine East India chicken curry, parboil a pair of tender chickens. Remove the bones and cut the flesh up into two-inch squares. Season and dredge the chicken lightly with flour. Fry a white onion cut fine and a half clove of garlic (the latter is not strictly necessary) in two large tablespoonfuls of butter. Remove the garlic, if used, and put in the pieces of chicken and fry them a fine brown. Add a tablespoonful of flour to the butter the chickens were fried in, and stir in slowly about three cupfuls of the water they were parboiled in. Let this sauce boil slowly a few minutes, then add the pieces of fried chicken, with a tablespoonful of grated cocoanut, and let the whole simmer a quarter of an hour. Then dish the chickens and stir into the broth a tablespoonful of the best English curry powder which has been wet to a paste with a little water. Taste the liquid to see if it is well-seasoned. Draw the pot containing it to the back of the fire, and add the yolks of two eggs, first beaten with a little of the hot broth. Do not let the liquid boil again, but turn it at once over the chickens, which should be surrounded by a border of rice.

The proper thing to serve with this curry is "sweet mango." It is excellent with no other accompaniment than rice. It is not strictly necessary to parboil the chicken, though East Indian cooks do it. Tender chickens can be fried in butter without previously parboiling them. They may then be simmered slowly in a little water or chicken stock, in place of the parboiled water. Season them as described, but, if you desire, omit the cocoanut. Veal or lamb curry may be prepared in the same way.

A famous English curry bears the name of Lord Clive. To make Lord Clive curry, stew until tender in a rich stock six sliced onions, a sliced green apple and a clove of garlic cut in half. Add a teaspoonful of curry powder, and season with salt and cayenne pepper. Warm up in this sauce any kind of delicate cooked meat cut into small pieces.

Things We Ought to Know

That an attractive table will cause a husband to come regularly to his meals.

That books, flowers and pictures are always acceptable to the sick.

That cranberries are healing to the throat and will frequently prevent soreness.

That all left-overs should be placed in china dishes—never in tin.

That children should be carefully trained to breathe through the nostrils.

That polished steel may be kept from rust by giving it a light coating of olive oil.

That hoarseness and cold in the chest may be greatly relieved by rubbing the chest twice a day with olive oil.

That children should be taught that to help mother is a pleasure rather than many of them contain more than 80,000 beads. Bamboo curtains, which are much cheaper than those made of beads, come for next season, more reasonable in price, though better in quality and coloring than ever before.

Surprising Summer Coiffure.

LATEST SUMMER COIFFURE.

You will have to get on both sides of a girl to know her now and so you will not fail to recognize her when next you meet. One side of her head, if she be up to date, will be curls and the other waved. Thus does the summer girl build her coiffure by halves.

Truths Told in a Few Words.

A child's respect for its parent is not secured by over-leniency any more than by over-severity.

A daughter should never seek nor be allowed to "outdress" her mother. In every family the mother should be the best dressed member.

The discarded finery of a daughter should never constitute a mother's wardrobe. No one feels especially dignified in the presence of one whose old clothes she is wearing, and a mother should at all times preserve her dignity before her children. The mother who never loses her queenliness will never lose her crown.—Ladies' Home Journal.

Handkerchiefs Are Kept Out of Sight.

The present fashion is to omit breast pockets in all coats, whether Prince Albert, frock, cutaway or sacque. Even overcoats are now made without breast pockets. The handkerchief is carried in the lower pocket, the trousers pocket or the inside coat pocket. The rule is now to keep that article hidden as much as possible. The handkerchief should be plain white, hemstitched.—Walter Germain, in August Ladies' Home Journal.

His Summer Vacation Card.

The fellow who gets a two weeks' vacation usually has enough to contend with in the shortness of his holidays without being subjected to a wholesale cross-examination at the hands of his numerous solicitous friends when he gets back. There is always the chap who insists upon firing the same old stock questions and making the same trite comments, until the poor devil who has just returned to work grows decidedly weary.

One of these came back to town a couple of days ago and immediately upon his reappearance in his favorite haunts it was: "Hello, old man! Been away?" Or "Pretty well sunburned, ain't you? Where have you been? Have a good time?" and a host of other tiresome greetings embellished with interrogation points.

The second day he determined to save his breath and to all his anxious friends he handed a card on which he had written: "Yes, I have been away. I spent my vacation at Atlantic City. I had a good time. I know I am sunburned. I agree with you that I am looking better than before I went away. I noticed that it rained considerably. I didn't go fishing. Any queries not answered here will be attended to by mail upon receipt of a stamped and addressed envelope." The scheme has worked very well.—Philadelphia Record.

five millions four hundred and forty thousand—times in seventy years, which is "man's appointed three score years and ten." At each of these beats it forces 2 1-2 ounces of blood through the system, 175 ounces per minute, 656 1-4 pounds per hour, or 7.03 tons per day. All the blood in the body, which is about thirty pounds, passes through the heart every three minutes. This little organ pumps every day what is equal to lifting 122 tons one foot high, or one ton 122 feet high—that is, one ton to the top of a forty-yard mill chimney. During the seventy year's of a man's life this marvelous little pump, without a single moment's rest, night or day, discharges the enormous quantity of 178,850 tons of human blood.—Philadelphia Record.

"Unaccountable" Fires.

As is well known, a frequent source of "unaccountable" fires turns out to be, in reality, the spontaneous ignition of various materials more or less saturated with oils or fats. The following is considered a reliable list of common materials of the class which, when containing oily matters, will, under favorable conditions, oftentimes ignite naturally: waste, tow, rags, sawdust, shavings, cotton and woollen cloth, roofing felt, and, in fact, all porous combustible bodies containing an oily or resinous substance having an affinity for oxygen. All vegetable and animal oils have more or less affinity for oxygen, while those produced from the distillation of petroleum and shale are practically unacted upon by the element; but the oils which oxidize in the air most rapidly are the vegetable oils, such as linseed, hempseed, poppy oil, etc. Briefly, by far the most frequent sources of fires from spontaneous combustion are those which result from heat induced by the absorption of atmospheric oxygen.

Riveting With Compressed Air.

In regard to riveting with compressed air, the master mechanic of the Santa Fe road is quoted as saying that by the use in the Santa Fe shops of a stationary riveting machine three men are enabled to drive 2000 rivets per day of ten hours at a cost of $4.75, as compared with 200 rivets per day at a cost of $7 by hand labor; the truck riveters—the machine being operated by two laborers at a total cost of $3 per day—drive 3000 rivets, as compared with 175 rivets driven by hand labor by three men in a day at a cost of $6, while the staybolt breaker makes an average daily saving of $10. Further, the mud-ring riveters will drive as many rivets as can be handed to them and will make a saving of $12 to $15 a day for that class of work. Not only is this method credited with the great saving named, but is declared to insure every rivet hole being filled entirely and insures tight work, while of hand-driven rivets in mud-rings a large percentage invariably leak.

It Registers Fatigue.

A peculiar instrument is described in Science as being in use at Columbia University, namely, a dynamometer made to write on a kymograph. The maximum pressure of the thumb and forefinger or the movement of a single finger can thus be registered, and a series of movements showing fatigue be recorded; the curves give the actual amount of work done, the height of the curves being proportional to the pressure in kilograms. A comparison of this instrument has been made with the ergograph, curves being shown in which the movements made in lifting a weight and in extending a spring were simultaneously recorded—the fact appearing that the ergograph curves do not give a correct measure of fatigue, and, of course, no record when the weight is not lifted, whereas the dynamometer curves measure more nearly to precision in this respect.

A DARING ROBBERY

THE DOMINION BANK CLEANED OUT.

Thirty-Two Thousand Dollars Stolen—The Combination Changed and the Burglars had Twelve Hours of a Start before the Robbery was Discovered—The Detectives completely nonplussed.

We venture to say the history of bank robberies in Canada will not reveal a more clever, well executed and audacious robbery than that perpetrated in the Napanee branch of the Dominion Bank on Friday night last.

On Saturday morning when the bank unlocked its doors for business the combination on the vault proved refractory. No great importance was attached to this as the lock had on several occasions proved contrary, but the difficulty had been gotten over by calling in the services of Mr. Wm Smith, jeweller, who found that a few sharp raps with a hammer, directly above the combination was all that was required to bring the "tumblers" back into position. When the difficulty arose on Saturday Mr. Smith was called in, but after working with the lock for some time he abandoned his efforts and acknowledged himself "beat."

The manager, Mr. E. H. Baines, then telegraphed to Toronto for an expert to come down and doctor the combination.

The Merchants Bank accommodated the Dominion Bank with money for the day's business, everything went on much as usual and not one of the men connected with the bank had the faintest suspicion that a robbery had been committed.

On Saturday evening an expert from the Taylor Safe Works Company, Toronto, arrived and immediately set to work to open the vault. After five minutes work at the lock he became aware that the combination had been disarranged. For nearly five hours the expert worked at the lock, using the old combinations in every way imaginable. He turned and turned the handle, backward and forward, making up fresh combinations as he worked, until he finally struck the proper numbers and the door flew open. It was a mere lucky guess and but for the accident of striking the right number he would have had to force the safe. As soon as the door was opened the theft of the money was discovered. But this was not all. The expert found that the inner coverings of the combination locks had been removed, a wheel in each combination had been unlocked, and the covering were neatly put on again. The unlocking of these wheels disarranged the old combination numbers, and the thief knew that many hours must elapse before the robbery was discovered.

WHAT IT DISCLOSED.

The opening of the safe disclosed the fact that a clean sweep had been made of all the money in the bank. The robber secured $32,000 for his pains. Ten thousand dollars of this money was in five dollar bills, unsigned by the manager, but the balance of the bills bore his signature. These bills have been cancelled and managers of all local banks have been notified to examine all Dominion Banks bills tendered by strangers or patrons in the hope of tracing the ownership of the money stolen at Napanee. The numbers of all the bills stolen are said to be known by the manager of the Napanee branch.

HOW AN ENTRANCE WAS GAINED.

Entrance was gained to the bank in a manner that reflects credit on the burglar, or burglars, as the case may be. The bank is a stone building and fronts on John street, a light is kept burning in the bank at night. At the rear of the structure there is a wooden shed, which encloses a stairway to the upper storey, and a hallway to the back entrance of the bank, the door of which opens on the side street. The burglar gained an entrance to this shed by undoing the hasp on the inside of the door.

Here, screened from observation, he bored a number of holes in the blocksiding which formed the partition, removed the boards and gained an entrance to the back hallway. The door leading to the bank was easily opened, and no doubt the combination of the vault soon yielded under his skilful manipulation. Once inside the vault he was free from intrusion or danger of detection, and everything would indicate he proceeded quite leisurely about his work. He chewed tobacco and spit copiously, and when the expert succeeded in opening the ally arises, how did the burglar gain possession of the combination? There are instances on record were burglars had become so expert that no lock was proof against them. It is just possible that the man who did the job in Napanee had no previous knowledge of the combination, but just trusted to luck and his own ingenuity and cleverness to carry him through.

It is stated that a stranger bought a ticket here for New York on Saturday morning and that another stranger was noticed in the company of the man. It is just possible this was the man who did the job.

BELTED AND PELTED.

A CONFIDENCE MAN MOBBED BY HIS VICTIMS.

He Sold Them Belts—Put up a Dollar and Expected a House and Lot—Some Gave Him Money Because They Loved Him—Nit

There are various ways of making money but the man who expects something for nothing always gets it in the neck. The public dearly loves to be humbugged and the crafty and unscrupulous are ever preying on the verdancy and cupidity of the people on the lookout for snaps. On Saturday evening a well dressed stranger took up his position on John St., at the corner of Paisley's grocery, and proceed to take the crowd, which congregated there, into his confidence. He was a remarkably clever fellow and up to the close of the performance the people were delighted with his bright and pungent remarks.

He first attracted attention by driving around town in a nobby turnout, accompanied by a small boy. In his hand he brandished something resembling a cross between a sword and a cheese knife and he announced that with this he would decapitate the boy in the rig. When the turnout pulled up on John Street a large crowd had congregated and the professor proceeded to amuse them by performing several slight of hand feats. After this he launched out into a dissertation on the benefits of advertising. He prefaced his remarks by exhibiting a roll of bills thick enough to land him in the Klondike. He told the crowd that he was not there to sell them anything. "I have an object in coming here, and that object I propose to disclose," said the man in the rig. He told of the money Hood's and the Kickapoo Indian Medicine Company spend in advertising, but he adopted a different and more effective method. Some called him the crazy doctor, but he believed the money he expended in advertising repaid him. After he had discursed for some time in this strain he told the crowd that he was a dentist. "I don't intend to sell you anything here," said the man. "If you want to do business with me you will have to come to my office at the Campbell House. I believe in spending money. If you would see the elegant suit of rooms I have had fixed up for my convenience at the hotel you would be surprised, my rooms during my week's stay in town will cost me more than any one of your dentists pay in rent for their offices in a year." This the fellow said was one of his ways of advertising. At this juncture the man announced that he could draw teeth with a common lead pencil. He invited anyone in the crowd to come up and have a molor extracted but no one responded. From this he branched of by easy stages on to electricity and its efficaciousness as a curative element. Here he produced an electric belt which he claimed would cure all the ills humanity was heir to. He wanted to introduce a few of them. The regular price of the belt was $5 but in order to introduce them he proposed to sell a few for $1. The money could be deposited with the Mayor or Chief of Police and if the belt was not all he represented it to be the $1 would be cheerfully refunded. For his standing he referred them to the Bank or Dun's Commercial agency. He then announced he would give a few belts away. He reconsidered his decision, as people who really had no use for the belts would hold up their hands and take them providing they could get them free. He asked if there was one man who would give $1 for the belt, on his assurance that if he did he would never regret it. One man with a complication of diseases pushed up a dollar bill to the crazy doctor. He received his belt. The electric doctor then produced a bag full of silver coins and handed the purchaser back $1.50. His object he announced, was to introduce the belts and make those men living, walking, breathing, advertisers for him. He believed before he got through he would be the most talked of man in the district. As time was valuable he informed the crowd that for the space of two minutes he would sell belts for $1 and then cease. In this time seven belts were disposed of and each man had his $1 refunded and received a gratuity of 50 cents.

The crazy doctor then introduced a remedy for removing corns. He was adverse to giving this remedy away as it might fall in the hands of people who had no corns, but any body who felt disposed to give him five, ten or 25 cents for it would receive a bottle. If they gave him a quarter he would keep it, but anything less than that amount would be thrown away. The five and ten cent pieces fairly rained

He chewed tobacco and spit copiously, and when the expert succeeded in opening the safe a burnt tallow candle was found therein, which must have served the burglar for a light. The coolness of the nervy villian is apparent. After mastering the combinations of the vault and safe he dexterously changed the combination, turned the locks and quietly walked out with a fortune. He took pains to remove all traces of his visit as the shavings made in boring the holes in the partition were all carefully gathered up and the boards in the partition all put back in their places. The holes made by the auger were covered up by placing a slat of wood across them, which was fastened by placing screws at both ends.

FIXING THE TIME.

There are various conjectures as to the time the robbery was committed. That the burgular was well acquainted with the movements of the employees of the bank goes without saying. There is no doubt that the author of the robbsry made a careful study of the bank premises, the habits of the officials, and gauged his movements accordingly. The popular theory is that the robbery was committed at the dead of night. Here is a bit of evidence that goes to disprove this. During the progress of the band concert on the market on Friday night James Roblin, of Haines & Lockett, and George Meagher were leaning up against the Dominion Bank, drawing their breath and listening to the music. Mr. Roblin heard a noise from the interior of the bank resembling that of a number of coins jingling together and called his companion's attention to it. He suggested informing Mr. Ponton, teller of the bank, who was standing a short distance from him, of what he heard, but as it was only about nine o'clock in the evening Mr. Meagher was of the opinion that he would only be making himself ridiculous and he abandoned the idea. The fact that Messrs. Roblin and Meagher were interviewed by the detective shows that some importance is attached to what they heard.

WILL NOT TALK.

Those connected with the bank are very reticent on the subject. It is understood that no effort will be spared to ferret out the guilty parties. A detective has been in Napanee for the past few days working on the case, and already a number of citizens believe they have been interviewed by him. A great many affect to believe that he has appeared in various disguises, and if one half the stories told are true he is a remarkably clever fellow. It is believed the bank authorities are in possession of a clue, but of what nature of course is not known. The robbery is supposed to be the work of professionals, and adept ones at that.

A FAKE BANK INSPECTOR.

All sorts of rumors are floating around, none of which can be verified. One of these is to the effect that a short time ago an alleged government inspector of banks visited town and was shown through both the Merchant and Dominion Banks. It is further stated that both the managers of the Merchant and Dominion Banks were mysteriously warned some time before the theft occurred that a robbery was to be committed. Mr. Baines when spoken to in reference to those rumors by an EXPRESS representative simply shook his head and smiled.

THE GENERAL MANAGER IN TOWN.

On Wednesday Mr. R. D. Gamble, General Manager of the Dominion Bank, visited town and held a conference with Mr. Baines. A meeting of the directors was held at Toronto on Tuesday, Hon. Frank Smith presiding, at which the robbery was discussed. At this meeting Mr. Gamble gave a detailed statement of the robbery and a list of those employed in the bank and the different positions they occupied. The General Manager places the actual cash loss at $15,000, there being taken besides $10 000 in unsigned bills, and other papers, which made the total $32,000. It is expected that besides the inspector of the bank special detectives will be engaged, and the officials are hopeful of not only capturing the thief or thieves, but of recovering the securities as well as the cash.

MUST HAVE KNOWN THE COMBINATION.

The expert who succeeded in opening the safe is confident that the burglar knew the combination, no matter how he came possessed of it. The employees of the bank, not even the manager, did not know the comdination of the safe in full. There are two doors on the safe and the manager of the bank and the cashier, each locked against one another. The head official had supplied the manager of the bank with one half the numbers of the combination and one of the clerks wiih the other half, and each was not supposed to know the whole, so the safe could not be opened except in the presence of both. Laid the Corner Stone

The Corner Stone of St. Luke's church, Camden East, was laid amid great eclat by the Hon. N. Clarke Wallace yesterday. There was a large crowd in attendance and Mr. Wallace delivered a happy address. The Yarker band enlivened the proceedings with choice selections of music. An excellent dinner was provided at the conclusion of the ceremony. The Rev. Mr. Woodcock and those associated with him are deserving of praise for the able manner in which the affair was conducted. We hope to be in a position to give a more extended report next week.

A Quiet Wedding.

The consummation of a short courtship was solemnized at the Royal Hotel on Saturday evening last when Miss Edith McNicholl, eldest daughter of Mrs. Harry Hunter, and Mr. Albert Edward McCabe, commercial traveller, of Montreal, were united in wedlock by the Rev. Mr. Parker, pastor of the Western Methodist church. The ceremony was performed in the presence of only the immediate friends of the contracting parties. The happy couple are quite young and we hope their venture upon the sea of matrimony may be a pleasant and prosperous one. After the ceremony Mr. and Mrs. McCabe left for Montreal, returning to town on Monday, when the Citizen's Band took occasion to serenade them.

Married at Belleville

At high noon, Wednesday, Rev. Newton Hill united ined wlock Miss Josie Dalton, daughter of Mr. John Dalton of this city, to Mr. Clark T. Botting, of Napanee. The ceremony was performed at the residence of the bride's father, Church street, and was witnessed by a few friends of the contracting parties. The bride was gowned in cream silk, covered with net, and was assisted by her sister, Miss Ella Dalton, who was attired in Nile green silk. Mr. D. Fralick, of Napanee, did the honors of groomsman. The bride was the recipient of many very handsome presents. The young couple left on the afternoon train for Toronto and other western cities and will make their future home in Napanee. The bride, who is one of Belleville's most charming daughters, carries with her the best wishes of a large number of friends and acquaintances.—Belleville Sun.

The five and ten cent pieces fairly rained upon the professor and were dutifully flung out for the boys to scramble for. Occasionally a man would put up 25 cents and his money would be refunded with a quarter tacked to it.

This state of affairs went on for some time, the fakir making a lavish display of money. He then switched back on the electric belts and announced that for that night only he would dispose of a limited number for $1 per belt. On the following nights the price would be $3 and $5. He informed them not to buy the belts because he told them so, but to take his advice and watch the man that did. He secured the assistance of a man in the crowd to hold his hat and then he proceeded to do business proper. Everytime he received a one dollar bill for a belt he placed three dollars with it, took a silver coin out of his satchel, rolled them nicely together and placed them in the hat. When business flagged a bit he would take a roll of bills out of his hip pocket and exhibit it, saying, "I may be a tramp but gentlemen, I'm a pretty well-heeled tramp." Electric belts were disposed of like hot cakes, and each time the formality of placing a few dollars with the dollar received and throwing it in the hat was gone through with. The professor told each purchaser not to leave the waggon, but to remain there until he was finished. He tied Texas knots in them, he initialed them, and marked the belts in many ways, but it was noticed that he disposed of them quite readily. He told them he hated a stingy man and a snake. He would pass the snake and step on the stingy man. The fun went on until the sale of belts had passed the half hundred mark. One man was so much taken with them that he purchased four, another two, and several men borrowed money so as to participate in the good things going. As the number of purchasers who crowded around the belt bargain counter increased the foremost buyers grew a trifle anxious.

During a lull in the sale of belts the professor inquired if there were ten men in the crowd who would give him a dollar, without expecting anything in return. One liberal hearted individual responded, with a half dollar and two quarters. The half dollar, the "doctor" announced, he intended to have engraved with the initials of the donor on one side, and his own on the other. The two quarters he proposed to put in the contribution plate on Sunday. Not to be outdone in generosity the professor refunded the man his dollar, at the same time presenting him with fifty cents, and the crowd around the waggon cheered. During another lull in business the "doctor" enquired if there were not twenty men in the crowd who would present him with one dollar a piece, "make him a free gift of it. To do what he liked with it. Throw it to the birds, give it to the church, go and get drunk with it if he liked. A free gift, and they were to expect nothing in return. Come now gentlemen, I need the money."

Only seven men were generous enough to respond to the professor's request, and he shook hands with each one several times. He then looked about for some paper to number them on. He could find none, so he numbered them on electric belts and presented each man with a belt. This was pretty near the close of the performance. The professor now took the hat, filled to the rim with bills, and caressed it fondly. He asked the crowd if they had purchased the belts for the good, or with the hope of reward. All the purchasers responded they had bought them for the good. There was one exception. A healthy looking bewhiskered individual said he purchased his with the hope of having his money returned and receiving a present. "I'm ashamed of yon" said the professor. He then appealed to the crowd. He had been honest with them, he wanted them to be honest with him. The money belonged to him. He had told no lies, he had made no promises. As good business men, he asked them what would they do with the money if they were in his place. "Keep it," yelled the crowd.

"I know you are good business, and I am a good business man. I will take the advice of you good business men, and keep it," said the professor, suiting the action to the words by dumping the money into his satchel.

"But hold on," said the doctor, "there was one woman bought a belt from me, I here refund her her dollar. Gentlemen, they call me a fakir, but I never beat women or cripples. My business is with strong, husky men."

The professor here announced that the show was at an end. The crowd realized they were sold. One man cried out "kill him" and in less than a second the doctor was in the hands of a howling mob. They hit him, choked him, and kicked him, but through it all he clung to the valise.

PROSPERITY! PLENTYY!

Heavy Harvests, High Prices, Good Times Back Again.

BETTER TIMES for the dry goods men, too; though never any more high prices for them. We don't pretend to be glad of that. We didn't go into business for the purpose of making things cheap for our fellow-man. Some stores advertise that they did, and you smile, gently. Ours is not a charitable enterprise. We sell cheap, because we have to—because if we didn't sell goods cheapest, some one else would sell them. And we have enough business sense to know that dry goods prices must remain low, and must be lowest in the small towns. So we hope for good times—not from better profits. but from bigger business. You can afford to spend more money this year. We want to get every last cent of it that attractive goods, square dealing and good service, can bring our way. And we've made ready for a big fall business in

DRESS GOODS.

THAT MEANS that we've bought an unusually big stock of dress stuffs; also that we have ventured into some better qualities in dresses than we've usually sold. Each year the dress trade runs more to single dress patterns, and qualities that formerly cost fourteen or fifteen dollars a dress are now thrown in the shade by dresses at five and six dollars. It does not cost anything extra to have the only dress of a certain shade and pattern. We have gone in pretty heavily for pretty single patterns, but we won't wait till the end of the season before we begin to sell them cheap. They are going (and coming) every day now. And we make the deliberate statement that we can show you new dress goods at fifty cents a yard that have more style, more beauty, and more quality, than last year's dollar goods. We welcome ladies that are looking around, and do not urge you overmuch to buy. We claim that we have the best equipped lining and trimming departments in Napanee, and our MISS BARRETT has no superior for stylish dresses or mantles. And that brings in Mantles and Mantle Fabrics.

THE FIRST CONSIGNMENT of our imported mantles will be taken out of bond this week; others are following fast. The chilly evenings hint at mantles and wraps already—suppose you look in and see them. We intend to keep our place as the largest handlers of mantles in our vicinity, and we are proud of these values. Cloakings of most kinds are here already, and are winning much praise. The range of styles is wide, the values exceptional. We are making quick sales in velvets for capes, at prices that most retailers pay for them; and in light-weight cloths for capes and costumes, in which our range is particularly good.

Lahey & McKenty's.

Several men interposed and kept the crowd back, and conveyed the man to the Royal Hotel where he succeeded in eluding his victims.

We do not know what the belts were worth but the fakir's gains are estimated at $100. The man made no promises but he conveyed the impression that he intended to reward those who purchased belts from him. While we have no sympathy for the people who were gulled by his transparent game we emphatically say that the authorities are direlect in their duty when they allow a man to conduct a confidence game on one of our principal streets. Even if the man was conducting a legitimate business, he should not be permitted to barter his wares, in such a manner, to the detriment of our business men, who pay taxes.

We unhesitatingly condemn the action of the crowd in resorting to violence when it dawned upon them that they had been fleeced. They placed their faith in a street corner fakir and were "turned down" It is a good rule to look askance at the man who offers you something for nothing and to never give money to a stranger with the expectation of getting it back with interest Nerves Shattered—Business Gone—Hope Gone—A Physical Wreck Restored Completely by South American Nervine.

"Two years ago I was completely prostrated with nervous debility. I was so completely wrecked that I had to quit business. I tried best physicians, and numerous treatments and proprietary remedies with no relief. Reading testimonials of wonderful cures effected by South American Nervine I decided to give it a trial. Before I had taken half a bottle I received great benefit. I have taken several bottles, and feel justified in stating that it is a wonderful medicine. Before taking it my nerves were so badly shattered I could not sign my name legibly. I feel that too much can not be said in praise of it." E.

POLICE PROTECTION IN EAST WARD.

To the Editor of THE NAPANEE EXPRESS.

Will you kindly allow me space in your valuable paper to set forth a grievance which the residents of East Ward have endured for fully two months, but not to the same extent, for several years. An electric light is placed within the triangle formed by the road leading from Newburgh to the covered bridge, and leading from Newburgh to and under the rail road bridge to the covered bridge.

On north side of rail road bridge the side walk is built up from the ground high enough to make it a very comfortable restingplace, and just between this walk and the G.T.R. property there is a large elm tree. Now 'tis here on this walk and under this tree that the rough, tough, ho dium element of this town congregate night after night and make night hideous with their yells, curses, and the foulest talk, (I will not call it language) that such an element can utter.

On Friday night last these hoodlums commenced their orgies before 11 o'clock and kept it up until after 12 o'clock midnight, during which time there were two fights with the usual accompanimente.

Last night a greater crowd than usual had gathered at this point.

The writer on his way home at about 9.30 last night saw them there and as they had settled down, and ready for their usual orgies, and as the writer had made up his mind that these disgraceful gatherings must stop, told them so and turned back to procure the services of the chief of police.

Not finding the chief, but finding County Constable Sills, who, without the least hesitation and very courteously, (and for which I here thank him very much) went with me to their place of congregating, but when we arrived the whole gang had flown. The names of quite a few of these gentry are known to the writer, and those not known can be obtained, and unless the town officials take some steps to protect the residents of East Ward from this gang of rowdies, some of whom are young, some very young, and some old, the parents and relatives of this gang must not feel aggrieved at finding their children, brothers, or relatives figure in the records of the police court, for stopped it must be. A word to the wise is or should be sufficient. Thanking you very much Mr. Editor,

I remain yours very truly

Cassidy vs Morrow et al.

This action was tried at the last assizes in Napanee and upon questions left to the jury they found that the plaintiff had suffered $500 damages by the illegal distress. The questions of half year's rent collected in advance and other points were left by consent to the judge to settle. On Monday, Judge Robertson give judgment for the plantiff for $570 and full costs of action. W. R. Riddel and G. F. Ruttan for Plaintiff. R. C. Clute Q.C., and D. H. Preston Q.C., for defendants.

Death of a Pioneer.

Mr. Roger J. Conger died at Picton on Monday evening at 6.30, in his 91st year, Mr. Conger, from 1830 to 1860, was actively engaged in business in Prince Edward county and all through what was then known as the Midland Counties. In 1816 he represented his county in the Parliament of Canada, being elected for the unexpired term of the late John P. Roblin. At the next general election he was again a candidate in the Reform interest, but was defeated by the late Mr. David Stevenson by one vote, after an exciting contest, the voting lasting a week, and all the votes in the county were polled in Picton. Later he purchased a large tract of land in the County of Grey, and for some years devoted his energies to developing it, building mills, roads, etc. Since 1880 he has been living quietly in Picton. The funeral took place at 2.30 p.m. Wednesday. He was of United Empire Loyalist descent, his father emigrating to this country in 1786 from New Jersey, and located on the Bay of Quinte, just northeast of Picton, known as Conger's Mills.

Toronto Daily Globe Aug. 28.—"A most remarkable record of success has been made by the Albert College, Belleville, in both Departmental and University Examinations. Out of a total of 31 candidates prepared for Senior Matriculation into Toronto University, 28 have been successful, and of 14 candidates for Senior Leaving Teacher's Certificates, 12 have been successful. Of this year's class of 5 Senior Matriculants, all were successful; of 8 candidates for Senior Leaving, 7 were successful, and of 8 candidates for Junior Leaving, 7 were successful and the eighth will, without doubt, receive his certificate, his name not appearing because of error in report. But without counting this candidate, over 90 per cent, of the candidates have been successful. This is certainly a phenomenal record."

David Shae, an old resident of Tyendinaga, residing near Read, was sent to the House of Providence, Kingston, on Thursday of last week. He died on Wednesday morning, and his funeral took place on Friday at Read. He was about 85 years of age; his wife died some years ago. He was at one time a man of great physical strength and many tales are still told of the wonderful feats he performed.

The Seed and the Grave.

"In the town of Hanover, in Germany, there is buried a German Countess who denied the existence of God and ridiculed the idea of the resurrection. To fur ther show her contempt for Christianity, she ordered that on her death her grave should be built up of solid masonry and covered by large stones bound together by iron clamps. On this tomb was engraved her defiant challenge that through eternity this tomb should never be disturbed.

"But one day the seed from some tree, either blown by the wind or carried by a bird, became lodged in a small crevice of the tomb, where soon it sprouted and began to grow. And then, as if nature had seemed to mock the haughty infidel, she quietly extended the delicate roots of that seedling under the massive blocks of stone and slowly raised them from their place. And now, although scarce four generations are passed since that tomb was sealed, that most insignificant seedling has accomplished what God Himself was challenged to accomplish."—Evangelist Moody, in Ladies' Home Journal.

Iron Contamination of Water.

A very frequent contamination of water is that arising from the presence of iron, particularly where a relation exists to coal mines, iron mines, ferruginous, and argillaceous sandstone; even ground water and well water, otherwise pure and unobjectionable, often contain salts of iron, which usually come from ochery strata. In case the geological strata consists of hard, insoluble kinds of rock, such as granite and gneiss, the water remains comparatively free from contamination, and is what is ordinarily termed "soft;" if, however, the water in its subterranean course comes in contact with rocks containing components similar to rock salt, it becomes saliferous, and if it strikes limerock, dolomite, or chalk, etc., it takes up certain quantities of them, becomes calcareous, and is in that case called "hard." In respect to the ferruginous contaminations referred to, while these in no way render the water insalubrious, it is found to become turbid and unsightly from the effect of the oxide of iron formed by the action of the atmospheric oxygen, and, when precipitated, soils drinking vessels and kitchen utensils.

Mr. Wm. Tullock, a highly respected and esteemed farmer of Tyendinaga Township, passed away suddenly on Friday last, aged 65 years. Deceased leaves a wife and eight sons, eight brothers and eight sisters to mourn his loss. It is said of him that he hadn't an enemy in the world. He was a Scotchman and noted for his integrity, probity and industry. The funeral took place on Sunday to Lonsdale and was one of the largest ever witnessed in that vicinity.

Here's a marriage notice that appeared in an exchange: "Married at Flintstone, by Rev. Windstone, Mr. Nehemiah Whitstone and Miss Wilhelmina Sandstone, both of Limestone." This is getting mighty "rocky" and there is bound to be a blasting" of these "stony" hearts before many "pebbles" appear on the connubial beach. The grindstone of domestic infelicity will sharpen the ax of jealousy and discord and sooner or later one or the other of this pair will rest beneath a tombstone. Then look out for brimstone.—Grafton Record.

He Followed the Advice.

"How far can you swim, Willie?" inquired the visitor.

"Oh, I don't know," replied Willie.

"Across the ocean?" persisted the visitor facetiously.

"I shouldn't wonder," answered Willie promptly.

"Why, Willie, do you know how far it is across the ocean?" demanded Willie's mother.

"Don't care how far it is," retorted Willie. "Pop told me once never to admit that I couldn't do a thing until I'd tried and failed and I never tried this."—Chicago Post.

Increasing Humus in the Soil.

Another point that does not sufficiently impress itself upon the average farmer's mind, it seems to me, is the matter of storing up humus in the soil. Thousands of farms are suffering for just this added decaying organic matter. When straw, grass, leaves, etc., are buried in the ground, and decay there, there is supplied not only plant food from the decay, but such an improved mechanical condition of the soil also as greatly assists growth. Where soil inclines to pack, it needs just this lightening that is furnished by plowing under decaying organic matter. Stiff soils are also greatly improved by the same treatment, looking at the purely mechanical condition of the land. But there are undoubtedly other ways in which available fertility is added to the soil by such decay. Much otherwise unavailable fertility is undoubtedly set free by the chemical changes that thus take place in the decay of organic matter. The great value of humus in the soil is forcibly shown in the fertility of land reclaimed from the forest, which has carpeted the ground for generations with leaves. "Green" manuring will put humus into the soil, but its profitableness will depend upon circumstances—the market value of the crop that may be turned under. For land in many situations the plowing under of green crop is undoubtedly the cheapest method of fertilizing it; but whatever one's circumstances, it is wise to turn under all the straw, refuse hay, cornstalks, etc., that cannot be used to advantage elsewhere. Best of all it is to get a second, or third, crop growth of clover to turn under when plowing. The roots in the soil, and the clover stalks above the surface, will give organic matter that will both mechanically improve the soil and likewise add to it a great store of fertility.—Practical Farmer.

TOWN COUNCIL.

COUNCIL CHAMBER,
Napanee, Sept. 7th '97

Council met in regular session, Dr. Leonard presiding, present, Madole, Carson, Miller, Perry, Boyle, Ming.

The minutes of last regular session were read and adopted.

A communication from Denis Daly offering to pay two thirds of the cost of a granolethic walk around his residence was read and on motion the offer was accepted and a four foot walk will be built this month.

Mayor Ward entered and took the chair.

On motion it was decided to lay a cement walk four feet wide, from F. W. Smith's residence to the post office. Reeve Leonard was in favor of a 4½ foot walk as that was the width of the post office walk. Coun. Carson was not in favor of making the walk 4½ feet wide—four feet was wide enough. It was all well enough to say the walk at the post office was 4½ feet wide. We didn't want to imitate the extravagance that had characterized the building of the post office.

Deputy reeve Madole thought a four foot walk was wide enough. It was only a matter of $1.75 at the most but it was these little things that had put us where we were.

Reeve Leonard didn't agree with this. He believed it was the big thing, waterworks, bonuses, etc., that had placed the town in its present position.

On motion of Ming and Carson the walk recently taken up in front of U. Wilson's was ordered to be laid down on east side of John St. from Dundas to Mill Sts. outside line of trees.

Coun. Miller was requested to wait upon the secretary of the Fire Underwriters Association while in Toronto in reference to the rating of the town.

A petition from Dr. Cowan and M. J. Warner asking on behalf of the ratepayers on the east side of John St. that a cement walk, 6 feet wide, be laid down upon that street, the ratepayers along the street to pay half the cost of the walk, was read and referred to the Street Committee to report. A similar communication from Thos. E. Anderson and D. S. Warner, agreeing to pay half the cost of a granolithic walk in front of their property was read and referred to the Street committee.

Edward Roberts asked that his taxes for 1897, amounting to $11, be remitted as he was in straitened circumstances. The matter was referred to the Finance Committee.

Mr. Percy, who occupies the town property, was heard in reference to enlarging the store he occupies, he agreeing to pay the cost of the improvements providing he was granted a five years lease of the property. The matter was referred to the Town Property Committee.

A by-law was introduced to levy the rate for the current year. The rate was struck at 27½ mills for schools and general purposes.

MARRIAGES.

GONU—TYNER—On the 1st. inst., at Christ Church, Tamworth, by the Rev. J. R. Serson, Mr. Christopher Gonu to Minnie eldest daughter of Mr. John A. Tyner, both of Sheffield.

Herbert Grooms, the fifteen year old son of Mr. N. B. Grooms, of Richmond, passed quietly away on Friday last after a lingering illness with that fell disease, consumption. Deseased was mute and had been attending the Deaf and Dumb Institute at Belleville. He was a very bright boy. The funeral took place on Sunday.

It is now generally believed that County Treasurer Vanluven is not in the land of the living. Since his departure, no one has seen him, and it is probable that he committed suicide. It has been discovered that $20,000 cannot be accounted for, and this sum does not include street-railway bonds, valued at $6,000. As soon as the audit is completed by Mr. Murray, County Auditor Lang will open a court here for further investigation into the books.—Kingston News.

Mrs. Philip Freeman, passed away at her home in Colebrooke on Sunday, aged about 65 years. Deceased had been ailing for some time with heart trouble, which was the cause of her death. Her husband preceeded her to the grave some few years ago. She leaves a family of five boys and three girls. Deceased was a highly esteemed and respected resident. The funeral took place on Tuesday from the Wilton cemetery, Rev. Anderson conducting the services.

On Friday afternoon an old man created considerable excitement by falling down in a fit in front of the Tichborne House. He was given a ticket to Kingston by the town after he recovered. It would appear that the old chap is quite an adept at the "fit business." We notice by our exchanges that he had a similiar one in every town he visited. Upon his arrival at Kingston he had a bad attack in a street car and of course was conveyed to the hospital. He gave his name as Myers.

Miss Ruttan, of Sydenham, arrived in town on Monday night and on Tuesday she imbibed too freely of intoxicants. In the afternoon she went up to the G. T. R. station and purchased a ticket for Kingston. The girl hung around the station, and although she was not misbehaving herself, a number of boys were bothering her, and one of the officials telephoned to the police to have her removed. She was placed in the lockup at 2 o'clock, p.m., and shortly after 8 o'clock was allowed her liberty. The girl is intelligent, fairly good looking, and comes of a highly respectable family.

ONE HONEST MAN

DEAR EDITOR—Please inform your readers, that if written to confidentially, I will mail, in a sealed letter, particulars of a genuine, honest, home cure, by which I was permanently restored to health and manly vigor, after years of suffering from nervous debility, sexual weakness, night losses and weak shrunken parts. I was robbed and swindled by the quacks until I nearly lost faith in mankind, but thank heaven I am now well, vigorous and strong, and wish to make this certain means of cure known to all sufferers. I have nothing to sell and want no money, but being a firm believer in the universal brotherhood of man, I am desirous of helping the unfortunate to regain their health and happiness. I promise you perfect secrecy.

THE SLAVE OF LIQUOR

IS NOW TO BE COMPLETELY CURED BY THE BLOOD OF HORSES.

The Astonishing New Experiments by Dr. F. W. D'Evelyn to Cure Alcoholism in Man—What "Equisination" Is The Inherited Taint.

Science holds out now a new lamp of hope to the rum-ridden.

The man who has not will enough of his own to leave drink alone, the wabble-spirited victim who has come out uncured from the racking ordeal of the gold cure, and sees nothing before him but ruin, infinitely worse than death, may read this story and pluck up new courage. There is another chance for him, after all.

The new treatment is called "Equization." It is to alcoholism what vaccination is, and for a century has been, to smallpox.

That bold experimentalist, Dr. Jenner, chose the cow as a medium for his war against the smallpox plague.

It is the horse which Dr. Fred W. D'Evelyn, the head of St. Luke's Hospital, in San Francisco, has selected with which to fight the demon drink.

But Jenner's valuable discovery of the value of vaccine virus, unspeakable boon though it was to humanity, had by no means the scope of the new rum cure. For this marvel "Equisin" promises not alone to wean the drunkard from his love of the cup, but to drive out from the blood of innocent children the taint handed down to them from generations of wassailing forbears.

Dr. D'Evelyn's discovery is the result of fifteen years' study and experimentation on the subject of alcoholism and the hereditary transmission of the alcoholic tendency. He has settled to his own satisfaction the much-mooted question as to the number of generations which such a taint must travel before it is eliminated by natural causes. The conclusion is that the great-great-great grandchild cannot be counted free from the curse, even though intervening generations strive by abstinence and right-living to overcome it.

This condition of inherited alcoholism Dr. D'Evelyn calls alcocytism, from the "alcocyte," the new element of corpuscle which is established in the blood by saturating it with strong drink. The aim of the new process is to destroy this element by neutralization, and restore the system of the "alcocytic" child or of the "alcoholized" drunkard to the condition it was in before drink was ever heard of.

Dr. D'Evelyn was a surgeon in the English army in Zululand when he began his experiments to this end. He chose the horse as the most available animal for the working out of his theory, because of the plenitude of its blood, its freedom from disease, and because, being thoroughly domesticated, its food and hygiene can be had under perfect and unremitting control.

The beasts chosen for experiment were first found by careful veterinary examination to be in perfect health. Then they were subjected to incessant administrations of alcohol, the amount being increased in a constant ratio.

The effects were found to vary as they do in men. Some horses accommodated an incredible quantity of stimulant without showing any injurious effect from it for a considerable time. Others suffered at once in appetite, nerves and temper.

By chemical tests and by distillation it was proven that the alcohol became an element in the blood. The corpuscles were changed in character, chemically and biologically; the blood was an altogether different matter after rum had done its work. It was this altered corpuscle to which the scientist gave the name of alcocyte, and which, he has demonstrated, is transmitted from parent to offspring, implanting in the inebriate's child the deadly fondness for drink.

The process by which the horse's blood is to be converted into an agent for the emancipation of the slaves of liquor is briefly this:

When the animal has been thoroughly subjected to alcoholic treatment its blood is tested. If it be what is termed "ripe," or thoroughly alcoholized, it is drawn off into a sterilized vessel which contains alcohol and is mixed therein to influence the clot.

For twenty-four hours it is allowed to settle, then it is subjected to intense cold, and after a thorough shaking for the space of half an hour is decanted. The residuum obtained is of a pale reddish yellow or straw color, slightly sticky and nearly transparent.

This is "equisin," which is to restore the happiness of homes, save up the wasted moiety of hundreds of thousands of salaries, reduce the population of mad houses and distribute peace and prosperity over a sin-cursed world.

POULTRY RAISING

Some Hints to Beginners—The Market The Chief Aim, After All.

If one could carry out the ideas advanced in books on poultry-raising, both for eggs and for meat, and make it a specialty, and, having overcome every difficulty, and succeeded just as the books and pamphlets argue, and would make one a successful man or woman in that line, the main item would still be to make sales and handle the cash. In order to do this one must study the markets at each particular season. He must be observing, shrewd and good at figures. Above all things he must not despise the day of small things. It is easy enough, if experience teaches that it will do, to branch out and enlarge, much easier to add than to shrink and contract, viz., with safety for your capital. You need also a good honest commission man in the city.

A young man writes: "I have a few hundred dollars to invest; will it do for me to buy six or eight acres at $50 per acre and engage in poultry-raising for a living business? Shall I look to egg-production or raise for meat? I am young and have a wife. I think I should like the business.

We answer if you and your wife like the business, yes; engage in it. Right management will yield eggs in midwinter. If these come to market in good condition they will sell for a fair price. But there is competition on every large farm where suitable buildings shelter the fowls and where feed grain is so abundant that no one even thinks of feeding the hens, they can help themselves. On such places there also is a great plenty of offal from the table and the dairy.

The thirfty and frugal housewife sees to it that the scraps go to the hens and chickens. We seldom feed curds now; they have come into disrepute, but in former years while living on a large farm, curds were made and systematically fed to the chickens.

The hen house should be roomy, so that the birds are not crowded; it should be light and warm, and, on the poultry farm, should have in it a stove for heating the room in case of a bitter cold night, and of these we have more or less every winter. This stove and fixings should be so arranged as to be well secured against fire; also have guards of some kind to prevent the hens from lighting upon it, and thus burning their feet. The south side, especially, and more or less the east side, should have large glass windows and double sashes. When one comes to examine the matter by figures these things are not very expensive. The windows need not be large, and should, on the outside, at least, be guarded by wire fencing of small meshes.

The yards, each for a separate breed, should all center in the building, which, of course, should also be partitioned so that while the fowls could see each other they could not mix.

To raise "fancy stock" is not the idea at all; but to have select and choice breeds certainly is. I have known a farm where no new blood had been introduced for years; the breed of "dung-hills" had run out so that a full grown fowl dressed would only weigh about one and a half pounds. It certainly cannot be profitable to raise such stock. Young male birds should dress at least four to eight pounds. These are only hints, which we hope may be of use to new beginners.

THE efforts of the authorities in endeavoring to stamp out the followers of the scarlet woman, who have too long been granted a free rein in Napanee, will meet with the hearty approval of all our citizens. These moral lepers should be either "drummed out" of town or sent to gaol.

LAST week's Beaver contained an editorial article from Mr. Whitney's Junk Shop in Toronto. It is but one of a number of articles prepared at headquarters and which appear simultaneously in the Conservative press throughout the province. The article in question is an attack upon the Hon. John Dryden's management of the model farm at Guelph and capital is sought to be made out of the fact that it is not self sustaining. The Model Farm is for the purpose of experiment, education and instruction on the lines of stock and general farm improvements and has proved of great value to the progressive farmers of Ontario in demonstrating to them by tests and experiments the right mode of tilling the soil to secure the best results for their labors. It is wholly unnecessary to enter into a defence of the Model Farm for its utility and benefit to the province is recognized by all successful and wideawake farmers' and by hundreds of farmers' sons who have taken a course of instruction in the college. The old, stale, and unprofitable falsehood about the Central Prison piggery is adverted to. The report of 1896, which gives the receipts and disbursements of that and the preceding year, shows that despite the heavy loss caused by an outbreak of hog cholera necessitating the destruction of many animals, and the burning and rebuilding of the piggery, a balance of $1,046,77 remains to the credit of the industry. Had it not been for the cholera outbreak the balance would, no doubt, have been several times

NAPANEE, FRIDAY, SEPT. 10th 1897.

OLD SOL worked overtime on Labor Day.

THERE is a charming indefinateness about the utterance of Mr. Whitney. In opposition he has never brought forward a reform of any great moment, but judging from his remarks he would be a wonderfully clever fellow if he was only somebody else.

ANOTHER canard has been nailed. Wm. Smith, Ex. M.P., made a statement to the effect that Hon. John Dryden sold the office of Registrar of Deeds for the County of Ontario. Mr. Dryden brought the slanderer into court and the bold Mr. Smith made an abject apology.

IT seems impossible for Ontario Conservatives to conduct a campaign without introducing sectarian issues. An attempt is even now being made to set Catholic against Protestant in the hope of gaining a party advantage. "The facts for Irish electors," and the disturbance over Ontario Separate Schools met with the fate it deserved and we feel that the attempt to create discord by dragging the sacred name of religion into a political campaign will result in the complete discomfiture of the crafty damagogues who resort to such despicable tactics.

would, no doubt, have been several times that sum. The Hon. John Dryden has proved himself an able, capable and economical Minister of Agriculture. He is a farmer, who farms, and has a practical knowledge of the needs and requirements of the agriculturists of the province. The benefit of having a practical farmer as Minister of Agriculture has long been realized by those engaged in this industry and is in marked contrast to the policy of the late Conservative regime which considered a brewer or a lawyer good enough for such a position.

FROM OUR EXCHANGES.

Hon. John Dryden did build a "piggery," but he didn't steal the pigs, which is more than can be said concerning several institutions run by the late Government at Ottawa.

White Soot.

A good story is told of an incident that took place a short time ago on board an English ship. The piper had blown to "Clear up decks for divisions," it being Sunday). When the upper-deck sweeper was about to sweep the deck he observed a lot of soot coming from the cook's funnel. The sweeper called the cook's mate up and pointed out to him the state the deck was in.

"But," said the cook, "I cannot help the soot coming up."

"Yes, you can," said the sweeper; "it's the usual routine to whitewash the coals on Sunday."

The cook, being a very green beginner, went and whitewashed every lump of coal he had in the coal box to get white soot.

sperity over a gin-cursed world.

"It contains," Dr. D'Evelyn says in his report, "the essential element of the alcocytic blood—a chemical reaction of alcohol on the blood compound." Repeated experiment upon alcoholic victims has proven that the cures which "equizination" effects are complete and lasting.

Equisin plaques are prepared by saturating chemically pure bibulous paper with the equisin. These are baked in a hot air chamber, and when cool are placed in sterilized glass jars.

Their use is effected by making a little wound upon the arm of the patient and applying the equisin plaque to the wound. It is fastened in place with strips of court plaster and two or three drops of sterilized water dropped upon it to insure a uniform moist surface. The moistening is repeated after twelve hours, then requires no further attention. It remains in place four or five days. The application is repeated weekly for eight or nine weeks, no stimulants, sedatives, narcotics or crude chemicals being permitted during the time.

In the case of children Dr. D'Evelyn advocates equization every seven years, except in grossly apparent cases, when the application should be continuous for two years. He says, finally:

"Owing to the universality of the taint, I contemplate the importance that all children from four years upward be equizinized."

Called a Halt.

An English beadle was lately much exercised at the appearance of a strange old gentleman who, when the sermon was about to begin, took an ear trumpet, in two parts, out of his pocket and began screwing them together.

The beadle watched him until the process was completed, and then, going up, whispered: "Ye mauna play that here! If ye dae I'll turn ye oot!"

A Texas murderer, who was a carpenter, watched with keen interest the erection of the gallows upon which he was to hang. A Criticism.

"These verses," remarked the elderly man, "have a very agreeable sound. But there's too much in them about 'running brooks' to strike the popular chord."

"But it's something that most poetry has in it."

Patent For Fattening Pigs.

The most ingenious scheme ever devised by the Yankee mind was that of a man who wished to claim as exclusively his a plan for fattening hogs by a wonderful method. The plan was this: Three pigpens were built, one having several lean scrub swine, known as "razor-backs," the central one being empty, and the third containing the blooded animal which it was desired to fatten. The scheme was to let the fine pig into the central yard and let him eat all he could out of the trough. When he had so much as he could hold, a hungry pig would be let in, and, of course, begin to eat. It being a pig's nature to eat as long as it saw another pig do so, the man reasoned that the full pig would immediately set to work again and take another meal. When the razor-back was full he was to be taken out and a third hungry pig brought in, when the same performance would be gone through again.—Philadelphia Times.

Good News From Missouri.

Robert Cornwell, a Barton County (Mo.) farmer, living near Golden City, after numerous experiments, thinks he has succeeded in developing a potato that will grow without vines. They grow entirely underground, and will do away with the fear of potato bugs, which cost so much to destroy each season, not to mention the damage they do. A field planted with the vineless potato may be worked with the ordinary harrow. Should the new potato prove to be a good producer, as Mr. Cornwell hopes, it is likely to supersede the present variety.

Bean Straw For Sheep.

It has been well attested that bean straw is a valuable feed for sheep, and that they are fond of it. The bean, like clover, is a leguminous plant, and many farmers say that the straw, though coarse and harsh, has nearly as much nutrition as clover hay. It makes a very rich manure when fed to either sheep or cows. That is shown by its rotting very fast when piled and giving off the strong smell of ammonia which comes from feeding any manure rich in nitrogenous nutrition.—Dakota Field and Farm.

Bitter Disappointments

And Family Grief That Can Be Avoided

PAINE'S CELERY COMPOUND BRINGS HEALTH, JOY AND HAPPINESS.

You are willing to confess, poor sufferer, that you have been bitterly disappointed with past efforts, and that in your estimation your future seems dark and gloomy.

You and your friends alone are to blame if disease is tightening its chain around you, making you a sure captive for the dark and dreaded grave.

Why keep a wife or husband in feverish anxiety, daily bending over you with tearful eyes and almost broken heart? Why cause your children's voices to be hushed, and their childish sports and games to be disregarded and cast aside? They certainly cannot enjoy life when they see a father or mother in the agonies of suffering and deep in mental despair.

You can change the scene by changing and bettering your physical condition. In other words, you can be cured and made well again by the use of Paine's Celery Compound.

Your efforts, up to the present, to throw off the encircling and deadly bonds of disease have been vain and futile. Your doctor's well meaning work has not been productive of cheering results, and you are wasting money on medicines that can never meet your case.

Being assured of new health and life by the use of Paine's Celery Compound, you are sinning against heaven and false to your family and friends if you refuse to make trial of the great agency that has saved thousands in the past.

Paine's Celery Compound is the grandest disease banisher that medical science ever devised, and has the indorsation of our

SHERLOCK HOLMES, JR.

By Wonderful Reasoning He Effects the Capture of a Bicycle Thief.

"Ha!" exclaimed Sherlock Holmes, jr., the great bicycle thief-catcher, "yonder goes our man. You say the wheel that was stolen from you was a seventy-two gear, with ram's horn handlebars?"

"Yes," replied the man who had been robbed.

"Good," said Holmes. "That is the kind yonder fellow rides. I can see at a glance, too, that he uses a stolen wheel."

"Wonderful!" his companion ejaculated. "How is it possible for you to tell all this by merely glancing at him?"

"Easy enough, my dear sir, if you know how," the great detective answered. "Look at his hands. You see they are sunburned only upon the bony surface just above the thumbs. If he used the old-style handle-bars his hands would be sunburned all over the backs."

"Most extraordinary deduction I ever heard of," said the citizen.

"Now," continued Sherlock Holmes, jr., "notice his walk. You see it is just an ordinary gait. If he rode a low-geared machine he would move with quick, nervous steps. On the other hand, if his wheel was high-geared, his steps would be slow and firm. But he walks along in just a common way, hence the bicycle that he rides is a medium gear."

TIMELY FRUIT NOTES.

HOW GROWERS SHOULD TREAT SHRUBS AND VINES JUST NOW.

Hints That, If Heeded, Will Make Considerable of a Difference in Next Year's Crops—Every Farmer Is Really Interested in This Subject.

Keep the raspberries pinched back.

August is the month in which to bud peach trees.

Use the suds from the washtubs as fertilizer in the orchard.

Always select trees with a smooth, healthy looking bark.

See that no suckers are growing from the roots of the fruit trees.

Cut out all of the old canes from among the raspberries now.

Proper thinning of the fruit gives it a better opportunity to develop.

August is one of the best months in which to set out strawberry plants.

Now is a good time to check growth by pinching back the terminal buds.

Late cultivation is often detrimental by not allowing time for the new wood to ripen.

Sort all fruit to be sent to market carefully, and in this way increase its value.

Prune out all useless shoots in young fruit trees before the growth is completed.

All wood that is more than two years old should be cut out of the gooseberries.

Use hardwood ashes liberally among the small fruits and in the garden.

When fruit is thinned the parent plant is exhausted far less than when all is allowed to remain.

One advantage in selecting a reasonably dry soil for an orchard is that it permits of deeper setting.

Coal ashes applied liberally around the fruit trees will help to keep away insect pests.

Before setting out strawberry plants, be sure that the soil is worked into a fine tilth.

Good growth now practically determines the value of bearing canes and vines next season.

Small and inferior berries are often the result of letting the vine get too thickly matted in the rows.

One objection to too low training in the orchard is that it interferes with the cultivation.

A good mulch properly applied keeps down weeds and renders the soil loose, moist and porous.

Every farm should have an orchard for home use, proportioned to the necessities of the family.

The safest way to get rid of orange rust in raspberries is to dig out every affected plant and burn it.

If fruit trees are kept carefully trimmed from the beginning they may easily be given the desired form.

For family use, especially, plant the orchard with a view to having the fruit ripen at different times.

The orchard can be made to serve two

A THRESHER'S LIFE

One of Exposure to Inclement and Changeable Weather.

He Easily Falls a Prey to Disease—Rheumatism One of the Natural Results—One Who Suffered for Uuwards of Nine Years Gives His Experience.

From the Intelligencer, Belleville, Ont.

It is doubtful if there is any other occupation more trying to the constitution than that of the thresher. Exposed to the rains and storms of the autumn season, and at the same time choked with the dust consequent upon threshing, he easily falls a prey to disease. Mr. Jos. H. Davis, a resident of the township of Wicklow, Hastings county, follows the threshing machine for some months every fall. For eight or nine years he was subject to attacks of inflammatory rheumatism. The disease usually made its appearance in the fall, and continued throught the winter, causing not only much suffering but great inconvenience. Mr. Davis' most serious attacks occurred during the winter of 1893. It first made itself manifest by the swelling of the right hand, and before twenty-fours had passed the disease appeared to have gone through the whole system, and the legs were swollen to an abnormal size, so much that the joints were not visible through the swellings. For ten months the trouble continued and during that period Mr. Davis was unable to put on his own clothes, and the pain he endured almost passed comprehension. One doctor after another was tried but without any beneficial results. Then advertised medicines were tried but with no better success. "I can hardly say," said Mr. Davis, "how much money I spent on doctors and medicine, but it amounted to a considerable sum, and yet I would most willingly have given my farm to be rid of the terrible pain I was forced to endure. But all my expenditures seemed of no avail, and I began to despair of a cure. At this juncture, acting on the advice of a friend, I began using Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. The first six boxes I used seemed from outward appearances to have had no effect, and I felt almost like giving up in despair. I thought, however, that possibly that was not a fair trial for one in my condition, and I procured a further

IMPROVED HITCHING POST.

An Easy Means of Preventing the Horse From Tramping the Grass.

When one places a hitching post beside a driveway on the lawn, the grass all about the post is quite sure to be utterly destroyed by the feet of the horses, since horses will move all about a post to which they are hitched, even when harnessed to a carriage. This makes an unsightly spot, and one where, very quickly, a pool of water will stand after every rain. The cut shows an "improved" hitching post described by a correspondent of The Country Gentleman, who says he first conceived the idea of locating the post just outside the roadway, in the grass, using the double swinging iron arm, with its snaffle, to hold the horse off the grass. This works well with most horses, but some will throw the arm over the top of the post, and so get on to the grass with all four feet. This is obviated by using the chain, as shown in the cut. This permits the arm to rise just far enough to reach the bridle of the horse, with play enough so that he can move his head freely, but does not permit him to throw it over upon the other side of the post. This device of using an arm to keep the horse away from the post accomplishes more than the preservation of the grassy sod. It keeps the horse from gnawing and disfiguring the post, and from rubbing his bridle and other parts of the harness against it—often to the serious injury of the harness.

IMPROVED HITCHING POST.

The treadle can be taken out for repairs when needed. A and B are made of wire; door and treadle of half-inch lumber. Dotted line D shows position of door when down. E shows track of lower edge of door when lifting to position F. A couple of staples will hold wire B in position. When the rabbit steps on treadle T, it pulls the wire B out of C, letting door fall. bicycle that he uses as a means of [illegible]

"This is simply astonishing," declared the man at the detective's side. "Now, tell me how you would know that the fellow rides a stolen wheel?"

The great thief-catcher drew a long puff from his cigarette, permitted the smoke to circulate freely through his lungs for about a minute and a half and then replied:

"Look at his nose."

"His nose!" exclaimed the other. "Surely you can't tell whether a man is a thief or not by simply looking at his nose!"

"Not in all cases," Holmes responded, "but in such cases as this it is the simplest thing in the world. You see the end of his nose has been exposed to the sun. It has just begun to peel off. Well, what does that signify? Merely this, my dear, sir, the fellow was not dared to buy a cap for fear of rousing suspicion, so he has been getting along with a common hat, with the result that I have pointed out."

The wonderful man then walked up to the thief, clapped a pair of bandcuffs upon him, and when the evidence, as set forth here, was in court, there was nothing left for the culprit but to confess and receive his sentence of imprisonment at hard labor for life.—Cleveland Leader.

Heroic Treatment.

"Even novices in medicine run to the experimental, as I have occasion to remember," tells a citizen whose word is never called in question. "I visited an old aunt of mine this summer, and, while reveling in rural enjoyments, I fell out of a cherry tree. There seemed to be a general jarring and shaking up of the system, that I thought demanded the attention of a doctor, but aunt prides herself on knowing more than half the men who practice medicine, and is committed to the old school of economy. She would bring me round all right. It would be a shame to send for a high-priced physician just to relieve a few bruises. Of course I was sore internally, for that was to be expected.

"The first remedy administered was catnip tea, which I took with that rebellious spirit begotten of childhood experiences. Then wild onion poultices were scattered judiciously over my person. Failure of relief caused my feet to be soaked in hot water and wood ashes, the lye distilled becoming so aggressive that I kicked the bucket over and repudiated the treatment. This was accepted as a premonition of brain fever, and a red-hot mustard draft was applied to the back of my neck. To the same end my head was thoroughly soaked in spring water. I entered a special complaint as to my side, and a poultice of grated horseradish was the answer. In response to a demand for some exhilarant I was given sassafras tea. I was disposed to insist on bran tea, but this was another brain-fever symptom, and more spring water was called into requisition. At length I surreptitiously hired a neighbor to go for a reputable physician."

"Did he effect a cure?"

"O, yes; I had a broken rib."

The Reason Why.

"Slowboy says he would rather run a lawn-mower than be in a hammock."

"How's that?"

"Now he says his wife can't put the baby in his lap when he is running the lawn-mower."

FOUR-HORSE LINES

An Arrangement Excellently Adapted for Field Work.

"Can you tell me how to drive four horses abreast with two lines, and without jockey sticks?" was recently asked us.

For field work the arrangement shown in the sketch presented herewith is perhaps as good as any. Put the ordinary checklines on outside horses as shown by L. Have four coupling straps made with snap on one end and an adjustable loop on the other end, by means of which its length can be readily adjusted. Separate cut (S) shows how straps are made. The loop works in hame ring, while the snap fastens to bit (B). Snaps may be used on both ends.

Another arrangement is to use lines on outside horses, same as here shown, and instead of the four coupling straps, use but three, and with these couple the horses heads together right through.—George T. Pettit, in Agricultural Epitomist.

Watering Plants.

In one of our horticultural papers, says T. Grenier in Practical Farmer, I find quite a discussion about the proper time of watering plants, especially whether the watering can be safely done in sunshiny weather or not. It seems to me that this is a case like that of the best time of pruning trees. Somebody hit the nail pretty well on the head when he said: Prune when the knife is sharp. When shall we water? Surely when the soil is dry, and if that be in hot, sunshiny weather, I would water all the more quickly. There may be some plants that cannot stand the direct application of water on the foliage, and for them it is advisable to put the water on the soil rather than on the plant. But that is a good thing for almost all plants, anyway. For instance, in watering celery, cabbage strawberries, potatoes, etc., the right way is to let the water run down between the rows, and soak into the ground until the latter is well moistened through. I would do this in bright weather just as quickly as I would in cloudy weather or at night, and I can say that I have never seen a garden vegetable injured by watering thus either in bright or dark weather. So far as the crops in the greenhouse are concerned, I have always watered indiscriminately, whenever I found the soil dry, and all the more freely when the sun was shining brightly. Indeed, our friends interested in greenhouse crops are well aware that the rule is to water lettuce only when there is a prospect of bright weather, and even then preferrably through underground pipes or tiles. The chief point is to water thoroughly whenever you do water, and then wait until the soil gets dry and needy again. Mere sprinkling is seldom of much account, and in outdoor operations sometimes seems to be an injury.

Roup and Small Chicks.

The best method of treating a flock of hens afflicted with roup is to administer this remedy in the drinking water. To one quart of water add ten drops of tincture of aconite. Air-slacked lime sprinkled on the floor of the house and on the ground outside the house, and even in the nests, will prove a good disinfectant. If the chicks are kept away from the hens they will probably escape the disease.

Shortness of Breath. "Since last year I have had serious heart trouble caused by malaria. Shortness of breath, smothering spells on retiring, violent palpitation, etc., often made me gasp for breath. On procuring Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills I found to my surprise and delight that they gave almost instant relief. I sot healthy restful sleep, my heart troubles disappeared, and I now feel very well and strong indeed." Mr. Hugh Moore, Ingersoll, Ont., makes this statement for the public good.

condition and I procured a further supply. By the time I had used three boxes more there was a considerable improvement noticeable, and from that out each day found me growing better. I continued using Dr. Williams' Pink Pills until I had taken eighteen boxes by which time I was in every respect a new man. I believe, too, that the cure is permanent for I have not known what it is to suffer with rheumatism since.

It will thus be seen that Dr. Williams' Pink Pills released Mr. Davis from the painful thraldom of rheumatism at a comparatively small expense after doctors and other medicines had utterly failed to give him even a fair measure of relief. It is obvious therefore that if Dr. Williams' Pink Pills are given a fair trial they are sure to bring relief and a cure. Every box of the genuine Pink Pills has the trade mark on the wrapper around the box, and the purchaser can protect himself from imposition by refusing all others. Sold by all dealers at 50 cents a box or six boxes for $2.50.

Washable Waists and Dresses.

When a cotton waist is to be frequently washed, and if not lined with a piece of the same goods or with white lawn, it should have a yoke, inside or out, of the same fabric, and facing around an under the armsizes, this being where most of the wear comes. Round waists worn beneath the skirt should extend three inches below. The waist and sleeves should have the French or bag seams, which have the raw edges put together on the right side and a narrow seam taken; then they are turned to the wrong side and a tiny seam taken, thus hiding all raw edges. If cotton plaids are made upon the bias they are apt to pull askew in the ironing. In buying embroidery to trim such gowns remember that patterns having small holes wear the best. Such dresses should be washed out quickly and dried in the shade; do not use strong soap on them. Pique, linen, crash, etc., should be well shrunk before they are made up into waists or dresses. Allowance should be made, for they are apt to shrink.

Always turn down an inch and a half at the top of wash skirts, which can be let down, when necessary. Use two threads half an inch apart in gathering the backs of skirts. Run a worsted braid along the under side of wash dresses, letting the edge barely show, and shrink the braid in boiling water before using it. In sewing on braid or velveteen hold it, not the skirt, next to you.—Emma M. Hooper, in August Ladies' Home Journal.

Reflections of a Bachelor.

One little corn that has just come is all a girl will ever own up to.

Young men dress for women, old men for themselves, and the rest dress because they have to.

A man has lots of faith in a woman till she begins to tell him what color neckties he ought to wear.

A woman is never afraid of a man, but she often gets a curious delight out of being afraid she might be afraid of one.

The average girl spends half her time not seeing jokes and the other half going around seeing subtle meanings in things where there ain't any.

A woman often says a thing that hasn't any meaning because she knows the men will think out a meaning for it and then think she meant it.

Bismarck and the Emperor.

Bismarck, who had worn himself out in the service of Germany and of his Emperor, rarely referred to his labors for the Fatherland. One morning he and the Emperor William were riding together in the park. They had not gone far when Bismark complained of fatigue. The Emperor, who was quite fresh, said somewhat testily:

"How is it that, though I am an older man than yourself, Prince, I can always outride you?"

Bismarck's reply was as reproachful as it was epigrammatic.

"Ah, sire," he said, "the rider always outlasts the horse."

The Latest in Organdie.

Organdies in the plain tints of yellow, pink, and especially gray, are the latest things in thin gowns, and some of these gowns have a flowered taffeta silk lining which gives them a very novel appearance. Plain organdies ruffled from the hem to the waist, each ruffle edged with lace, are the latest novelty, and narrow-

LINES WRITTEN IN A JUNK YARD

(With apologies to Rudyard Kipling.)

A fool there was and he bought a wheel,
(Even as you and I),
Some leather and rubber and a hunk of steel,
(We knew how sore in a week he'd feel),
But the fool only thought of the miles he'd reel,
(Even as you and I).

Oh, the trouble he spent, and how double he bent!
(The fool with his leadpipe wheel),
For the dealer had seemed of honest intent,
And had told him 'twas cheaper to buy than rent,
But that wasn't at all what the dealer meant,
(The dealer that sold the wheel).

For the wheels weren't round, and the tubes weren't sound,
(The wheel that lies there on the heap);
And the tires were made of paper, he found,
While the bearings were cast-iron balls—unground,
And he'd sell the whole thing for a cent a pound,
(The wheel that he got so cheap).

Overheard in the Park.

"Don't you think," said the girl with the blue sash, "that Charley Travers is about the silliest thing you ever saw?"

"Oh, I don't know," replied the girl with the red sash; "I think I've seen more foolish people than he is."

"But he says such stupid things!"

"Does he? Perhaps he only says stupid things when he happens to be in the company of stupid people."

"Why, Jess, how you talk! You know you used to say that he reminded you of a jumping jack!"

"Mame Benbrook, I never said such a thing in my life!"

The girl with the blue sash was silent for a moment. Then she rather angrily replied:

"Well, I suppose you have your own reason for being contrary to-day."

"I'm not contrary," the girl with the red sash replied, and there was a savage flash in her eyes. "If you must know it, I'm engaged to be married to Charley Travers. Don't worry, though, about a wedding present."

Then the girl with the blue sash went over and sat on another bench, and punched the gravel with her parasol, and thought.—Cleveland Leader.

Johnny at the Picnic.

"We had an awful time with Johnny Potts at the Sunday-school picnic."

"What was the trouble?"

"Why, Johnny wore one of these belts with a metal clasp."

"Yes."

"And after he ate his dinner we couldn't unclasp it."

"Good gracious! What did you do?"

"We tried to file it off and couldn't get at it. Johnny squirmed and yelled like an early Christian martyr all the time. At last Rev. Mr. Gusher hired a man to take Johnny in a boat and row him out to where the water was real rough. Johnny wasn't used to rough water, and in a little while the belt dropped off of itself."—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

PICKLES.

Some Tried Recipes That Will Generally Interest Housekeepers.

Homemade pickles are cheaper and in certain respects better than the commercial, which are usually put up in the vinegar made from acids.

Cucumber pickles are the "stand-by," and Marion Harland's new cook book gives the following recipe for pickled gherkins—as the small cucumbers are called:

Select cucumbers three inches or less in length. Lay them in alternate layers with salt in a large stone crock; let the top layer be of the salt, then pour on enough cold water to cover them and turn a weighted plate on top of them. Stir from the bottom every other day, and leave them in the brine ten days. Then pour off the brine and pick over the cucumbers, ejecting those that have up and down. Gray Swiss muslin made over gray taffeta silk and finished with a yellow or pink satin sash and collar makes a charming dress. Silk mull and chiffon are both very popular for sashes and soft belts on thin gowns, and they are sometimes edged all around with lace.

Swimming.

Swimming on the back in sea water, says a doctor, is the most beneficial form of bathing. Swimming on the side is very injurious to the muscles of the stomach.

Fruit on the General Farm.

Many busy farmers think that fruit growing is beyond them and that their time can be more profitably utilized in general farming. As a result thousands of country homes are deprived of the most helpful and at the same time inexpensive of all luxuries. No kind of fruit bought in the market is equal to the home-grown article, and the farmer's table will never be liberally supplied until he has his own fruit garden.

Can every farmer have these luxuries? Certainly. The same kind of thought, skill and labor which must be given to general grain farming will produce an abundance of luscious fruit. Use the same judgment in selecting plants and cultivating apples and small fruits as you do in choosing corn, wheat and grasses. Take care to select those varieties adapted to your soil and climate. There are a great number of varieties of all classes of fruit from which to choose. Be on time, thoroughly prepare the soil, plant the trees carefully and give them intelligent culture. Don't neglect the orchard for other farm crops, but throughout the whole season give it attention. Do as I have recommended and your fruit plantation will give you more in actual value and ten times greater satisfaction than any other equal amount of land on the farm.

A Bride's Sensible Trousseau.

Isabel A. Mallon writes of "A Bride's Moderate Trousseau," in the August Ladies' Home Journal. "The girl who has a fortune at her command needs no suggestions," she says, "but the girl who has to think out the wisdom of every dollar spent on her trousseau is the one who asks for advice. Taking it for granted, then, that you will live a more or less social life, having your day at home and visiting your friends, and going occasionally to hear good music, you can decide exactly what you will need. First of all, freshen all the gowns you possess, then you know their possibilities; then I would advise one handsome silk dress, combined, perhaps, with velvet, and having, to go with it, two bodices—one for wear when you are visiting, the other to be used when rather more elaborate dress is required. Have one simple, but smart-looking, wool dress for street wear; if required, you might better omit your visiting costume than this. A black skirt, either of moire, silk or satin, will be useful, since with it there can be worn any number of elaborate bodices. Then you will want, also, a comfortable wrapper, to wear in no place except in your own room; two pretty, well-fitting, house dresses; a coat suited to the season; a wrap that is a little more elaborate, if you can afford it; but do not make the mistake, so often made, of buying clothes that are not suited to your position in life, or, what is equally as bad, of buying such an elaborate wardrobe that it will go out of fashion."

Pretty Gown for Bridesmaids.

Fashion demands that bridesmaids should be dressed in some of the faint tints, and also in white in honor of the bride. Any fabric, more or less light, of course, out of which a picturesque costume can be designed, is counted good form. A toilette which might be worn when there are several bridesmaids has a foundation of pale green China silk; over that is a plisse skirt and blouse bodice of coarse fish-net, which has baby ribbon of green velvet run through the meshes diagonally. The yoke, which is full, is of white chiffon, and, like the fish-net, is over the green silk. The sleeves, full and finished with pretty frills, have ruffles of chiffon over the shoulders. At the top of the blouse portion of the bodice is a puckered heading of the chiffon, each little row of puckers being finished with a narrow velvet ribbon. The picturesque hat is of fine white Leghorn—Isabella A. Mallon, in August Ladies' Home Journal.

the cucumbers, ejecting those that have softened. Soak the firm ones two days in fresh water, changing it once or twice.

To green the pickles line your preserving kettle with grape leaves; arrange the pickles in layers, scattering a pinch of powdered alum over each. A heaping teaspoonful of alum will be sufficient for a large kettleful. Cover the pickles with cold water, spread a triple thickness of grape leaves over them, cover, and steam over a slow fire for six hours. The water must not boil. By this time the pickles should be well greened; then throw into very cold water. While they are turning firm and crisp in this, put a cup of sugar, three dozen whole cloves, three dozen pepper kernels, eighteen allspice berries and twelve blades of mace into four quarts of vinegar and boil five minutes. Drain the pickles, put into cans or jars, pour the scalding vinegar over them and cover. Keep in the cellar. They will do to use in two months. String beans may be pickled in this way.

For a sliced cucumber pickle, which is a novelty in many families, slice two dozen good-sized cucumbers, put in an agate kettle with vinegar to cover and boil an hour. Let them stand while you prepare a pickle made as follows: One cup sugar; one teaspoonful, each, of mace, allspice and cloves; one tablespoonful, each, of horseradish, cinnamon, ginger, celery seed, black pepper and tumeric, half a teaspoonful of cayenne. Put these into a gallon of cider vinegar, add the sliced cucumbers, simmer gently for two hours, then put into jars.

Cauliflower makes an excellent pickle. Cut a firm head into small clusters and boil three or four minutes in scalding brine. Drain them, put into a jar and cover with cold vinegar, let stand two days, turn this off and then cover with a spiced vinegar prepared by this formula: One gallon vinegar; one cup sugar; one tablespoonful, each, of celery seed, coriander seed, mustard seed and whole white pepper, sliced. Boil five minutes and pour over the cauliflower.

For English chow-chow is prepared by this rule: Cut one cauliflower into clusters, peel half a pint of small onions, slice six green tomatoes, and "string" half a pint of string beans; add a pint of small cucumbers, sliced, and four small red peppers. Arrange the vegetables in layers with salt in a large stone jar, using plenty of salt. Pour on cold water enough to cover and put a weighted plate over them to keep them under the brine. Let stand three days, drain off the brine, wash off the pickles with cold water and let them stand twenty-four hours in fresh water. Spice a gallon of vinegar as follows: One teaspoonful each of whole black pepper, celery seed, white mustard seed, horseradish, mace and whole cloves; two teaspoonfuls of tumeric, one and a half cups of sugar (brown); three tablespoonfuls of ground mustard. Bring to a boil, drop in the pickle, cook five minutes, skim out into jars, and cover with the scalding vinegar. Let stand forty-eight hours. Drain off the vinegar, put on to heat again and add a tablespoonful of curry powder. When the vinegar boils pour it on the pickles again and when cold put them into small jars or bottles and seal. Ready for use in two or three weeks.

Blackberry Flavoring.

How many housekeepers have ever used blackberries as a flavoring—not by the direct use of the fresh fruit, but by means of an extract that can be kept the year round? Probably there are comparatively few who know what palatable flavoring can be accomplished with extract of blackberries. This extract can easily be prepared by the veriest novice who will closely adhere to the following directions: Weigh out exactly one pound of fruit, and place in a preserve jar. Care must be taken that it is ripe, juicy and of the best flavor. Over this mass pour six ounces of 95 per cent. alcohol. Now seal the jar, as in preserving. Let the jar stand two days, or, better still, three. Shake well three or four times each day. On the second or third day unseal the jar, and throw the contents into a muslin strainer. Strain carefully until all the fluid has passed through. Next, gradually pass water through the strainer, letting it trickle through the fruit pulp, until an exact pint of extract in all has been obtained. If these directions are implicitly followed, failure is impossible. The extract, if kept tightly stoppered, will remain good the year round. Take pains to see that none of the fine seed of this fruit gets through the strainer. Owing to the presence of alcohol it is well to remember that this extract, as well as all others, is to be bottled and stoppered as quickly as possible after making. Is the flavor of elderberries pleasing to a family palate? If so, a very strong extract may be made if the elderberries used are of the best by following the same proportions given in the preceding recipe.

GRAMPA'S FARM.

Oh, you don't know the fun on grampa's farm,
For grampa says, "Let 'em; it ain't no harm,"
An' Cousin Bob starts us an' cries, "Here goes!"
An' mamma, she only just says, "Such clothes!"

We've a Crusoe's island an' robber's cave,
An' Tower of London, an'—don't you know,
When one of us wants to let on he's brave
He crawls under the sawmill, scared an' slow.

Oh, you don't know half the fun out there,
For grampa he never tells us "Take care!"
An' Cousin Bob laughs and says to "Carouse!"
An' mamma, you see, is off in the house.

We fish in the brooks an' play in the sands,
An' try to catch tadpoles out of the springs;
We hide in the bushes like Ingun bands
An' fight with the hornets, and get their stings.

Oh, there's no end of fun on grampa's place,
For grampa he says, "Now scoot on a race!"
An' Cousin Bob grins an' says, "There she blows!"
An' mamma, she only just says, "Such clothes!"

ORCHARD AND GARDEN.

Paragraphed Wisdom For Those Who Own Either or Both.

Young orchards often need additional fertility.

There is little danger of injuring an orchard by manuring.

In pruning cut out all weak and crowded branches.

All pruning cuts made at this time should be covered with oil or wax.

Starvation and neglect are the great causes of unfruitfulness with fruits.

Too large and too thick heads on the fruit trees should always be avoided.

Tobacco water will destroy worms and bugs on rose bushes. Spray it on.

If the fruit tree is heavily laden with fruit, thin it out before it breaks the tree down.

Keep a good lookout for tent caterpillars during the summer.

And I will answer thee.
—Oldest known Gypsy Folk song.

"The gypsy race shows no sign of extinction. The Romanys are as strong and as numerous to-day as they have ever been."

Thus spoke Paul Kester, ethnologist student of the lives, habits and language of gypsies. Mr. Kester is one of the greatest living authorities upon the American Romany. In his play "Zamar," one of the late Alexander Salvini's successes, he dealt broadly with his favorite subject.

"The gypsies," continued Mr. Kester, "came originally from Hindustan. The migration of the race occurred during the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. The sobriquet 'Egyptian,' which they assumed, was, it is supposed, owing to their temporary sojourn in Egypt. The name Romany, ethnologists derive from the Hindu rom, a man. Armed with protesting letters from one or more of the Popes, they appeared in Germany, and thereafter swarmed over Europe. I cannot say when they first came to America, but certain it is that they were not long after the first white colonists. Spain sent her Zincali to Mexico, while from France and England gypsy families crossed the Atlantic in pursuance of their roaming instincts.

"There are many thousands of them in the United States, and they permeate all branches of society. I know of an eminent and respected Episcopal clergyman in Boston who has Romany blood in his veins. Once a year the old wandering fever comes over this good man, and then, hey presto! the pulpit is temporarily abandoned and he follows the pattrin trail, or lounges contentedly among his kindred in the shade of the caravan tent. In many of our cities there are wealthy men and women, millionaires and so-called 'society people,' who are Romany-chals (gypsy men) or Romany-chis (gypsy girls), and who can not resist following the pattrin when summer time comes round.

"But, of course, the great majority of the race live in their caravans all the year round, telling fortunes and trading in horses for a living—going south with the approach of winter, and returning northward when summer is at hand. A generation or two ago polygamy was practiced among them in isolated cases; but to-day it exists no longer. An American gypsy has only one wife, and a very good husband he generally makes her. He is an excellent father, too. In all my long experience I have never seen a Romany father beat his offspring.

"Since the death of Matilda Stanley II of Dayton, O., a few years ago, the American gypsies have had no generally recognized queen. This Matilda succeeded her aunt of the same name, Matilda Stanley I, whose great funeral and the vast horde of gypsies that attended it will still be remembered. The Irish-American and German-American gypsies have rulers of their own. There are 700 families of German-American Romanys, and their queen is Sophia Freyer, a Romany-chi of nearly 80 years. For many years old John Gorman was king of the Irish-American Romany. He was succeeded by his wife, Queen Bridget, who in turn gave place to her son, Bartley Gorman, the present king. King John Gorman and Queen Bridget came to New York from Ireland in the forties, bringing with them their wagons. Since then they have roamed the country over and multiplied greatly. Their chief vocation is horse trading. Hiram Palmer, millionaire gypsy of San Francisco, who claims to have succeeded Matilda Stanley II, as sovereign of all the Romanys in America, died in 1894. His giant form and great wealth made him a familiar personage in California.

"All the gypsy families have two names—viz., their Romany patronymic and its equivalent in the language of their adopted country. Here, as in England, the principal families are the Lees, Stanleys, Hernes, Lovels, Grays, Coopers, Smiths, Wharton, Caulfields, Bucklands and Costellos. In Romany the first seven of these families are known respectively as Pureums, or Lesks; Barnesero, or stone people; Rossarmengro or duck people; Cumbos, or love makers; Grys, or horse people; Vardnesero, or wheelwrights, and Petulengroes, or horseshoers. It will be seen that in translating their Romany names they generally attempted a play upon

The skeleton in many a household is the peculiar weakness of the wife and mother, or of the wife who ought to be a mother and is not. Happiness is destroyed by the presence of the secret sickness that may lurk like a grinning death among the most luxurious homes. The most terrible thing about this condition of affairs is that it is entirely needless. There is no reason in the world why every woman in the world should not be strong and healthful and capable of fulfilling her whole duty as a wife and mother. Many women go on month after month, and year after year, becoming weaker and weaker, because of a very natural hesitancy they feel in consulting a physician. They know that if they go to a doctor for treatment, the first thing he will insist on will be "examination" and "local treatment." This must of course be distasteful to every modest woman. They are generally as unnecessary as they are abhorrent. Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription cures positively, perfectly, permanently, all varieties of "female weakness" and disease. It is designed to do this one thing, and it does it. It is the only medicine now before the public for woman's peculiar ailments, adapted to her delicate organization by a regularly graduated physician—an experienced and skilled specialist in these maladies. It cannot do harm in any condition of the system. Its sales exceed the combined sales of all other medicines for women.

Every woman will be healthier and happier for following the friendly, practical counsel contained in Dr. Pierce's great universal doctor book: "The People's Common Sense Medical Adviser." It is the most comprehensive medical work in one volume in the English language. It contains 1008 pages, fully illustrated. 680,000 copies have been sold at $1.50 each bound in cloth. The profits are now used in printing half-a-million free copies bound in strong manilla paper covers. To get one you have only to send 21 one-cent stamps (to pay cost of customs and mailing only) to World's Dispensary Medical Association, 663 Main St., Buffalo, N. Y. Send promptly before all are given away if in want of one. They are going off rapidly.

the baulo,' and thereby obtaining fresh pork. English gypsies smack their lips over the memories of toasted adchiwitchi, or hedgehog. The gypsy way to cook a fowl is to do it up, feathers and all, in clay, and bake it in the heart of the fire for a little more than thirty minutes. The clay is then removed, taking with it the feathers; the fowl is cleaned and the feast is ready. Yorkshire pudding, apple dumplings and other English dishes are great favorites with the gypsies.

"In so far as I know him (and I may safely say that I know him well) the American gypsy is one of nature's gentlemen—courteous, considerate and loyal, sacrificing friend to his friends. The average Gorgio, of course, the Romany dislikes and distrusts; but win the gypsie's affection, and you keep it always. The vagrant tendencies of the race can never be crushed out. They are in the blood, bred in the bone, of the true Romany. So long as the pure gypsy strain exists, chal and chi will follow the pattrin trail, tell fortunes, trade horses, woo the Gorgio's gold, and sleep with the broad arch of heaven for their canopy."—New York Sun.

KNOW HIM BY HIS NOSE.

This Feature Proclaims the Character of Man.

1. Do not marry a man whose nose shows any natural deformity or twisting; there will invariably be some corresponding flaw in his moral nature.

2. Do not marry a man whose nose comes out of the big forehead in almost a straight line, the type of nose often seen in statues following Greek models. Such a nose is invariably accompanied by extreme willfulness, selfishness and sometimes cruelty. Nero had such a nose and so did Mary Queen of Scots.

3. Do not marry a man with a sharp pointed nose, he will have a sharp, uncomfortable character. He will be hard to please; there will be acidity in his nature.

4. If a man tells you he is an artist or writer and has a nose that is not refined at the tip, do not believe him. There is great value in the aesthetic finish of the tip of the nose in men of these two classes.

5. If you want a husband who will make his way in the world and probably gain power or money, take one whose nose is broad ridged and prominent and bears a moderate hump in its upper half. If he is a wide headed man as well, he will insure you your wish. And he will be a brave fellow physically as well.

6. If you want a husband who will be the frame as shown at A, take a strong, close piece of burlap, cut somewhat larger than the frame, and set a ring in the center of the piece large enough for an egg to pass through easily. Tack this on the upper edge of the frame A, allowing it to sag five or six inches in the centre, as at B. To complete the nest and make it more attractive and natural for the hens, wisps of hay may be twisted and sewed on the inside. The frame should be made to fit tightly in the nest heretofore used, so that it will not have to be fastened. The egg will drop through the hole and roll to one side of the nest below. The eggs may be gathered by simply lifting up the front side of the frame.

Plastering a Silo.

We (Hoard's Dairyman) are sometimes asked whether it would not be a good plan to lath and plaster (with cement) the sides of a silo. Having never tried such an experiment, we are unable to answer from personal observation, but a writer in The Walton (N.Y.) Reporter says:

Last year, Leroy Evans, of Franklin, built a silo in the new barn on his father's farm, which he has been renting for a few years. The silo is 12 feet square, 27 feet deep and holds 75 tons. Mr. Evans and his hired man did most of the work. It was girded about 3 feet apart all the way up on all sides. On three sides, it was double boarded, and, on one side, one thickness of plank was used instead of boards. All the way up on the inside were nailed half-inch strips, two inches wide and about one-half inch apart. The bottom and sides were plastered with cement. Mr. Evans says it cost only about $30 besides his own work and the lumber. He thinks this is the best way to construct a silo, because no air can get to the ensilage, and no moisture from it can injure the buildings. He is building another one this season on the farm which he and his sister own, in the same way, only a little larger, and uses all plank in place of boards.

Ditching in Insecure Soil.

It is occasionally necessary to cut a trench through soil that will not "stand up" in the wall of the ditch. Sandy soil is of this nature. To keep the ditch open until a pipe can be laid, the plan shown in the accompanying diagram can be used to advantage. A stake is driven at one side of the proposed trench and is anchored from its upper end as shown in the sketch. As the trench is deepened, a board is slipped down behind the stake, an other stake secured in the same way. As the trench is deepened, the board is pressed down, and another added above it, the stakes also being driven down and so on till the required depth is reached. The same plan will probably have to be used on both sides.

Scott's Emulsion of Cod-liver Oil with Hypophosphites brings back the ruddy glow of life to pale cheeks, the lips become red, the ears lose their transparency, the step is quick and elastic, work is no longer a burden, exercise is not followed by exhaustion; and it does this because it furnishes the body with a needed food and changes diseased action to healthy. With a better circulation and improved nutrition, the rest follow.

pillars during the summer.

To secure the best grapes more or less thinning is necessary.

Pulling off vine leaves to let in sun and air is an injury to the vine.

The more healthy leaves a plant has the better the fruit will color.

Weeds and suckers should be kept down between the rows of raspberries and blackberries.

Fruit trees that have been grafted need to be looked after to see that the stock does not make shoots.

You can crowd fruit trees and plants only at the risk of getting reduced crops of inferior fruit.

Protection from too much sun is always an advantage with currants, gooseberries and raspberries.

When the peach tree is making a spindling growth of twigs and limbs, it is a good indication that the soil lacks potash.

With a young orchard at this time it will be a good plan to stop cultivation and mulch carefully, leaving the soil in good tilth.

Three or four strong canes to one hill of raspberries are better than a dozen weak, spindling ones. Thin out and stop unnecessary growth.

Surround the home with fruit and flowers. It will help in shaping and refining the minds of the children.

On the farm fruit should be a necessity rather than a luxury, as it is often considered in towns. More fruit and less bacon will give better health.

Thriftier and stockier raspberry and blackberry plants will be secured if the growing plants are kept pinched back during the summer.

If strawberry plants are to be set out in August, the better plan is to plow the ground now, at the first opportunity, before it gets too hard.

When the largest profit is made from fruit growing for market, special varieties are grown for special markets. Study your market before deciding on varieties.

Among the Poultry.

Geese and ducks should be full feathered before killing.

If eggs are stored in a damp place they will soon taste musty.

Buckwheat is a first-class egg producer.

Keeping fowls on a hard floor will frequently cause swollen feet and legs.

At night before they go to roost is a good time to give the fowls a little extra food.

Late hatched turkeys can be given a free range earlier than the early hatched.

When there is no check in growth the chickens will get over their feathering easily.

A rapid growth of bone, flesh and feathers demands frequent feeding.

If there are any hens to be sold this fall a good time to sell them is when they quit laying.

Dampness and lice are the great demoralizers among all kinds of young poultry.

A little flaxseed meal in their food will help the old fowls to pass through their moult quickly.

One hen that eats eggs will soon spoil a whole flock if allowed to run at large.

The flesh of the guinea is dark, but it has a delicacy of flavor that approaches that of wild game.

The best plan is to train the young poultry to roost in the poultry house from the start.

If young ducks are allowed access to a pond too early they are apt to have cramp in the legs.

The laying of unusually large eggs is pretty good indication that the hens are too fat.

When the hens stop laying a change of food will often start them to laying again.

Give the hens all possible freedom and there will be less trouble with soft-shell eggs, as they will secure the lime they need.

Early, well-developed pullets make good winter layers. Select them out before sending the fowls to market.

If the hens are too fat, change the grain ration and give a small quantity of whole oats daily.

One of the best times to commence feeding the fowls to fatten is just before they are fully matured.

Ducks will thrive best and fatten fastest on soft feed—one part cornmeal, one part bran and a little meat is a good fattening ration.

Wheat boiled until soft makes one of the best feeds to give young poultry. It is easy to prepare, clean and healthy.

Pigs on the Dairy Farm.

Dairymen who keep swine, and they always should, unless all the milk is sold, should mix grain of some kind with the skim milk or whey that goes to the pigs. Corn meal and skim milk in proper proportions cannot be excelled as pig feed. It is improvident for a dairyman to grow hogs on the waste from the dairy without any grain; yet the only way to prove this to some men would be by the use of the scales, in tests with mixed rations.

words, when they could not find the exact equivalents. In the same way, the gypsies have Romany names for most of the big cities in England and this country. They are quite opposite, too, as may be judged by the following short list, picked up around camp fires and caravans: Kaulo-Gav, or Black-town, Pirishaug; Bor-Gav, or Big-town, New York; Jevinor-Gav, or Beer-town, Milwaukee and St. Louis; Paunom ngo, or White city, Philadelphia, so called, I suppose, from its famous white doorsteps; Pureno-Gav, or Old-town, Boston; Signengo, or Quick city, Chicago; Pulge Gav, or Bridge-town, Brooklyn; Beluni Gav, or Queen city, Washington, and Matcheneskoe-Gav, or Fish-town, applied to Gloucester, Mass., and other sea coast towns.

"The nomadic gypsy bands are not as large as in less settled times, when the Romany was forced to travel in large numbers for self-protection. From twelve to twenty persons make up the average caravan to-day, although in some cases the bands number fifty or sixty. A very large band is the famous one of which old Chivodine Lovel is the chief. Every year Lovel's band comes north and camps between Newark and Elizabeth, N.J., in the woods by the Boulevard. These Lovels are every sixty in number. At one time they were suspected of having abducted Charley Ross, but the fair-haired boy found in their camp and supposed to be little Ross was proved a nephew of old Chivodine, and is now their apparent to the chieftainship. Chief Stanley's big family yearly encamps on Crow Hill, Kings County, N.Y. In the suburbs of Denver, Col., the gypsies ruled by Mrs. Caroline Smith meet annually, while branches of the Stanley family of Ohio encamp near Dayton, Cincinnati, and Cleveland.

"The pattrin is the code of signs by which gypsies tell each other the road to be followed. The word comes from the Sanscrit pattra, a leaf; and the common form of pattrin is the scattering of little tufts of grass or tiny bundles of leaves along the route pursued. Straw, sticks, pebbles and crosses in the earth are also used. The form of pattrin for night guidance is the placing of a small forked stick upward in the ground, with a smaller stick poised in the cleft to show the direction. Nowadays, however, the gypsies are getting so unromantic that they do a great deal of telegraphing. Oddly enough, the great gypsy exchanges in the various cities are livery stables and pawnbrokers' shops. The first fact is explicable when one recalls the horse trading of the Romany; but the second calls for explanation. Gypsies are the pawnbrokers' best customers. They buy lavishly all sorts of gold, silver and amber and cowrie ornaments, and nearly all their dealing is done with the pawnshops. The gypsy woman has an oriental taste in jewelry, and every Romany-chi possesses a box full of trinkets, especially in silver, amber, and (inheritance from Hindu ancestors) cowrie beads. The pawnbrokers keep in touch with the various caravans, and at the sign of the three golden balls the Romany learns the whereabouts of relatives and friends.

"It is difficult indeed to win the gypsy's confidence. He is distrustful of the Gorgio, or Gentile, by whom he has been persecuted, whom in turn he has hated and preyed upon for ages. It took me four long years to break the ice with a single Romany family; but, once broken, the rest was easy. Very soon I had a good colloquial knowledge of Romany. My friendship with the one family, and my acquaintance with the mystic pattrin code, proved adequate introductions to the gypsies everywhere. The American gypsy, as a rule, has no real religion. Frequently he ostensibly follows some faith, but he does it with his tongue in his cheek. Their word for God is Deva or Devel, from the Sanscrit deva, a deity; but the word has to them little or no significance. Broadly speaking, they are pagans. Yet superstition exists among them; though they affect to sneer at the spells and incantations with which their tricksters deceive the Gorgios.

"Many curious customs prevail among our Romanys. For instance it is common among the Colorado and California gypsy women, while secretly conniving at the marriage of their daughters, apparently to oppose the suitor's advances bitterly. This necessitates an elopement; after which the young pair, having shown their Romany spirit, are welcomed back to the maternal tent pole. Their cooking and eating habits are often odd enough. For pork they have a great fondness; and in old times they were accustomed when passing a farmhouse to 'drab the baulo,' (poison the pig) and beg the carcass from the farmer. The poison known as 'drab' is one of the Romany secrets. It is a curious drug which affects only the animal's brain, leaving the rest of the body unpoisoned. Many old Romany-chals have admitted to me that they still occasionally yield to the temptation of 'drabbing

6. If you want a husband who will be always hopeful and buoyant, take one with a tip-tilted nose, but not too short, for if it be that you will find him over impulsive.

7. And once more I say, not marry a man with a long, drooping nose. Besides being gloomy and secretive, he will probably be critical and fault finding.

8. If you want a husband in whose heart you will hold undisputed sway, do not marry a man with these three signs fatal to faithfulness. A narrow eye, almond-shaped or with straight edge under lid; an upper lip full at the center and red and moist; a palm which shows on the full, fleshy part under the thumb many well-cut lines crossing at right angles.

Wasn't Sure.

While a Scottish regiment was on the march in India from one station to another the doctor, as is usual at certain camps on the line of march, paraded the men for inspection, and, on going his rounds, made one man a prisoner for having dirt-begrimed knees.

The next morning the officer ordered him to headquarters, and asked him the reason why he didn't wash his knees.

"Weel, sir," replied Scottie, "there was a dizzen or mair o' us in a'e bine, an' I ken this much that I washed a pair of knees, but whether they were mine or no I canna swear."

Sending a Child by Mail.

A novel parcel for delivery by express post was handed in at the Birmingham postoffice. A working man, who had been out of town with his three-year-old child, arrived at Birmingham in time to reach his place of business, but not in sufficient time to take the child home. He therefore walked into the nearest postoffice and tendered the youngster as an express parcel. The authorities, under the rule regulating the delivery of live animals, accepted the child, and duly delivered it at the charge of nine-pence.

Morphine in France.

The injection of morphine is a habit this is, unfortunately, on the increase in France, especially among the middle classes. On statistics furnished by the pharmacists it is estimated that there are in Paris at least 50,000 victims of the morphine habit, the majority of whom are women.

For Disagreeable Odors.

Disagreeable odors arising from decaying vegetable matter are dangerous to tolerate at any period of the year, but most so during the height of warm weather. They can be destroyed at once by pouring over the heap two pailfuls of water, to one of which has been added one pint of the liquor of chloride of zinc, and to the other one pound of chloride of lime. Remember, this is something not to be neglected. Delays here are especially dangerous.

To Remove Paint From Glass.

To remove paint from window glass take some strong vinegar and heat it very hot. Wet a cloth in the hot liquid and wash the glass with it and the paint will come off quite readily. A strong solution of oxalic acid will also remove dry paint.

How to Clear Fly Specks Away.

Are the window-panes and looking-glasses fly-specked? Then use a little alcohol on them. It does wonders in cleaning and brightening glass of any description.

To Keep Flies at a Distance.

To keep flies away from gilt frames, boil four or five onions in a pint of water and apply with a soft brush. Mr. Fly will then give them a wide berth.

Make The Most of Yourself.

It is the duty of every man to make the most of himself. Whatever his capacities may be, he is sure to find some place where he can be useful to himself and to others. But he cannot reach his highest usefulness without pure blood. The blood circulates to every organ and tissue and when it is pure, rich and healthy it carries health to the entire system, but if it is impure it scatters disease wherever it flows. Hood's Sarsaparilla is the one true blood purifier. It cures salt rheum, scrofula, catarrh, dyspepsia and rheumatism because these diseases have their origin in the blood.

An Interesting Struggle.

While out cruising on the bay in the yacht Petrel on Monday last Mr. Rube Shipman succeeded in landing a forty pound maskinonge. It will take rank as one of the largest fish caught in the bay this year and Mr. Shipman will remember his struggle with the monster for sometime to come. When Mr. Shipman found that he had a large fish on the line he clapped on all sail and gave his mascoship a pretty swift time of it for a while. When the fish was pretty well tuckered out Mr. Shipman decided to land him in the dingy which they were trailing behind the boat. Without shortening sail Rube climebd out into the dingy and landed the masco, hand over hand. The fish had no more than struck the boat than it leaped back into the bay. Again it was drawn into the boat and this time it got clear of the hooks. Rube was fearful his prize would escape him and he dropped on it and then began an interesting struggle for the mastery. Rube emerged covered with scales but had the proud satisfaction of conquering one of the finest mascos of the season.

Labor Day at Deseronto.

The Labor Day demonstration at Deseronto was a pronounced success, and doubtless the largest crowd that ever congregated in Deseronto witnessed the programme of sports. The following bands were in attendance: 14th P.W.O.R., and Independent Fife and Drum Band, Kingston, Napanee Citizens Band, Yarker, Trenton, Picton, Marmora and Deseronto bands. At the park the combined bands, led by Prof. Denmark, played several fine selections, which were greatly appreciated. In the marching contest the Picton band captured the prize. Owing to a misunderstanding the Napanee band marched past the judges stand and did not counter march and march back again. This undoubtedly lost them the prize, as outside of the 14th they were undoubtedly the best band in attendance at the festival. The following is a summary of the sports in which J. P. Anderson looms up in good shape. Frank Lee, of Napanee, also made a good showing in the bicycle races, considering it was his first race, and the poor condition of the track.

Dr. Coutlee in Town.

Dr. Coutlee, the Reform Candidate in Addington for the Local House spent Monday and Tuesday in town calling on old acquaintances and forming new ones. Mr. Coutlee made a favorable impression here and is going into the campaign with an enthusiasm that is a happpy augury of success. The doctor will make a thorough canvass of the riding which will be thoroughly organized. The doctor impresses one as a man who is fully conversant with the questions of the day and he will make it interesting for his opponent, who ever that may be.

A Pronounced Success.

The Flower Show, under the auspices of the Napanee Horticultural Society in the Curling Rink on Friday last afternoon and evening, was one of the most successful events of the season, and if one wished to institute comparisons between the show of last year and Friday's display it would demonstrate at once the great stride made by the society in one short year. The display of flowers was large, varied and beautiful and the arrangement of the plants reflects credit on the taste and good judgment of those in charge. The interior of the large rink was brilliantly illuminated with incandescent lights, while the outside rink was lighted with arc lights. The show was under the management of Mrs. W. H. Wilkison, the indefatigable president of the society, ably assisted by the secretary, Mr. Jas. E. Herring, and Messrs. W. S. Herrington, Thos. Symington, Rev. McDonald, Mrs. A. McNeil, Mrs. R. G. Wright, Mrs. Robt. Mill, Mrs. (Sheriff) Hawley, Mrs. W. K. Pruyn, Mrs. Burritt, Mrs. Herrington, Mrs. J. L. Boyes, Mrs. Nelson Wagar, Mrs. Geo. Lloyd, Mrs. Harmer, Miss Belle Pollard, Miss Ballantyne, Misses Harshaw, Misses Ward, Miss Templeton, Miss Bay McDonald, Mr. Cowan and others. The professional services of Messrs. Lloyd and Harmer were

All Cordially Invited.

On Monday evening a grand free entertainment under the auspices of the Sons of Temperance will be held in Brisco's opera house. The meeting is being looked forward to with great interest as Mr. A. D. Meeks, of Toronto, Grand Treasurer, Provincial D. D. W. P., will be present and deliver an address preparatory to the Dominion plebiscite campaign. Mr. Meeks is spoken of as an eloquent and forcible speaker. Messrs. Bowen E. Aylsworth, warden of the county, and W. W. Meacham, M. P. P, will also be present and deliver short addresses. An excellent programme of instrumental and vocal music is being prepared in which the following well-known talent will assist: Mrs. F. E. Vanluven, W. H. Perry, F. Vandewater, Napanee; F. L. Tooker, Yarker; F. D. Moore, E. D. Shorey, Newburgh, and others. D. P. Henwood will give a number of piano selections and also act as accompanist. Doors open at 7.30 p.m., programme at 8. Everybody welcome.

The Bank Robbery.

There has been no new developments in the Dominion Bank robbery, although it is difficult to say what a day or an hour may bring forth. Detectives Hodgins and Greer, of Toronto, together with the bank detective have been in town all week working on the case. Two Pinkerton detectives are also said to be in this vicinity. The detectives are working on the presumption that the burglar was acquainted with the combination before he entered the bank. A great many rumors are floating around but it would answer no good purpose to retail them. The Toronto World of Sept. 4th., reproduced a post card, post marked Strathroy, to which it affects to attach some importance. The epistle is as follows:—"The editor, The World, Toronto World, Toronto. What was you paid to publish that rot about the Napanee bank robbery—who gave the robbers the keys of the treasury to take out the cash." "The Toronto World is rotten to write such stuff. Humbug." There doesn't appear to be anything in this. The following notice has been sent out to the banks and their branches by the Dominion Bank:

"THE DOMINION BANK."

The numbers of our unsigned ten dollar notes, which were stolen from our Napanee agency, run from
"No. 46001 to 47000—SERIES A—Dated 2nd January, 1888 and were not countersigned by E. H. Baines as pro-cashier.

If any of these bills are presented at your office, you are kindly requested to trace them back as far as possible and communicate at once with this office.—R. D. Gamble, general manager.
"Toronto, Sept. 1st, 1897."

The question now arises will these stolen bills be redeemed by the bank. The bank may not be legally responsible and may repudiate them, providing Mr. Baines' signature is forged to the bills. It may pay the bank better to pay the bills when presented, rather than have the public fight shy of all their bills. The Brockville Times calls attention to the fact that about the year 1872 a somewhat similar case occurred in Montreal when the now defunct Consolidated bank had a number of unsigned circulation notes stolen and refused to pay them. The Dominion Bank may prefer to pay the stolen money rather than suffer the bad moral effect of such a course. The written signature on a bank bill varies so much that the ordinary business man and the general public have really no safeguard against a peculiar case like this. One of the burglars, for instance, might sign his own genuine signature on the stolen bills instead of that of Mr. Baines, and to the vast majority this would appear all right.

In the Bald Mountains.

To the uninitiated a trip through the Bald Mountains, with its beautiful chain of lakes, rivers and streams, is a revelation. The editor of this journal, accompanied by Messrs. Geo. Thompson and James Roblin, made the trip last week and all three laid in a fund of fish stories sufficient to last until the deer season opens. A trip through the Bald Mountains used to be considered "something of a chore" a few years ago when the rock road-bed was unadorned with sand and the corduroy was much in evidence. The liberal grants to colonization roads made by the Ontario Government has rendered the drive a pleasurable one. This year $500 has been expended on the Clare River road to Cloyne and the work has been carefully and intelligently executed. There is excellent grazing land in the Bald Mountains and we had the

An old and esteemed resident of Richmond crossed the Great Divide on Friday, in the person of Marshall Bidwell Wagar, aged 60 years, 7 months, and 20 days. The funeral took place from the residence of Thos. Anderson, jr., on Sunday to the western cemetery and was largely attended.

The Ontario statutes for 1897 in the amendment to the Municipal Act provide that all nominations at municipal elections shall be in writing. This will do away with a good deal of nonsense and fooling at such meetings. Often one elector will nominate another for fun or mischief, and the one so nominated will return the compliment to get even.

On Saturday night the police "swooped down" upon the residence of Mrs. Orvie Lyn, Belleville road, and "gathered in" three Deseronto youths, a fourth one making his escape. The lady in question is better known as "Duck" Lyn, and has been a conspicuous figure upon our streets for a number of years. The following wards, who were sheltering under the shadow of the "Duck's" wing, were found in the house: Hattie Smith, Ida May Storms, and Mary Carr, the latter being only about 15 years of age. On Monday all the "doves," with the exception of Ida May, were brought before the Police Magistrate and remanded to gaol until today. The boys are out on bail. The Storms girl has been keeping out of the way of the police, but will likely be on hand for the trial.

The Laying of the Corner Stone of the New St. Luke's Church.

Thursday was a red letter day in Camden East, the Corner Stone of the new St. Luke's Church being laid by the Hon. N. Clarke Wallace. At ten o'clock the Orangemen, Prentice Boys and Clergymen, headed by the Yarker Band, marched from the Orange Hall to the church site. The Rev. S. R. Serson conducted the service. Miss A Sproule played the organ accompanied by Mr. M. Vanluven on the cornet and the congregation joined in singing the well known hymn, "The Church's one foundation." The rector of the parish Rev. F. Dealtry Woodcock read the memorial which together with the "Canadian Churchman" "Church Evangelist," Napanee Beaver" "Kingston Whig" "NAPANEE EXPRESS," a set of jubilee stamps and some coins, were placed beneath the stone. The Corner Stone being laid, addresses were given by the Rector, the Hon. N. Clarke Wallace and the Rev. F. T. Dibb, the offertory was then taken up, which amounted to $30.50, after which the benediction was pronounced and the doxology sung. The procession marched back to the Orange Hall and then dispersed. A most sumptuous dinner was served by the ladies of the congregation in Hinch's Hall, the people then adjourned to an adjacent field, where speeches were delivered by Uriah Wilson, Esq. M. P., Rev. T. R. Serson, John W. Bell, Esq. M. P., James Reid, Esq. M. P. P., Rev. W. G. Swayne and the Hon. N. Clarke Wallace, after which, a very exciting baseball match was played between Newburgh and Camden East. Newburgh won. The memorial placed beneath the stone is as follows.—In the name of the Father, and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost. Amen. On this second day of September, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and ninety seven, being the Diamond Jubilee, the sixtieth year of the reign of our most illustrious Soverign Lady Queen Victoria, the Right-Honorable the Earl of Aberdeen, being Governor General of Canada, and Sir George Kirkpatrick being Lieutenant Governor of the province of Ontario, this Corner Stone of the church dedicated in the name of St. Luke Evangelist and Martyr whereof Frank Darling of Toronto is the architect, William Saul of Camden East, the contractor for the masonry, David L. Brown of Deseronto, for the brick work, and Cyrus Ridge of Camden East for carpenter work, the most reverend, His Grace John Travers Lewis, Archbishop of Ontario, Bishop of the Diocese, the Rev. Francis Dealtry Woodcock, rector of the parish, Robt. Jones and Thos Hamilton church wardens, Charles Riley, Lay Delegate, the building committee, Robert Quinn, George E. Hinch, Ashcraft McWilliams, Thos. Milsap, Peter Tompkins, James Robinson, Charles Riley, secreasry, and Samuel Greenway, treasurer, was laid by the Honorable N. Clarke Wallace, (late controller of customs in Her Majesty's Canadian Government) in the hope that upon this stone may be erected a church, which shall be for the honor and glory of God, and by the blessing and guidance of the Holy Spirit continue to be (as its predecessor has been for sixty years) an instrument, powerful and conspicuous in shedding abroad the light of the Holy Gospel of the blessed Saviour. Amen. The old church was opened on the fourth of March, eighteen hundred and forty four. A beautiful trowel was presented to the Hon. N. Clarke Wallace by Charles Riley Esq., on behalf of the congregation. The trowel was purchased from Messrs. Chinneck & Son, Napanee. The gross proceeds of the day were about $175.

services of Messrs. Lloyd and Harmer were also of much assistance. The rink was handsomely decorated with bunting, flags, grasses, etc., the work of Messrs. A. E. Paul, W. T. Waller, Thos. Symington and Rev. McDonald. On entering the rink one was charmed with the panorama of beauty that met the view. Potted and cut flowers abounded in vast profusion. To attempt an adequate description of the scene is beyond us. The centre piece of the decorations was a well gotten up Ferris wheel, designed and constructed by Mr. Jas. E. Herring, the decoration being the work of Mrs. Burrett, Mrs. W. K. Pruyn and Mr. W. J. Cowan. The wheel was eleven feet high, and the supports and frame work were decorated with grasses, flowers, bunting etc. The drum revolved and had eight little carriages filled with plants of all hues and colors, rare, exotic and otherwise. The cut flowers were displayed around the walls of the building. The specimen cuts, which were arranged by Mrs. R. G. Wright, being greatly admired. At the northern portion of the building, the letters "N. H. S," fronted by a Beaver, lifelike in appearance made of sumach, met the gaze. It was extremely well constructed and Miss Ballantyne and Mr. W. W. Walter have reason to feel proud of their handiwork. At the south east end were a number of set designs prominent among which were the letters "V. R." surmounted by a crown, the work of Mrs. U. Wilson. Partitioned off in the north east corner was a reproduction of a battleship in full fighting gear, with guns, fighting tops, etc., the work of Mr. W. S. Herrington. The ship was constructed wholly of flowers and had an anchor. The boys were so taken up with the ship that they broke through and stole the anchor. A number of bicycles, beautifully decorated with flowers, were on exhibition. The bicycles belonged to Miss Harshaw, Miss May Ward and Master Daly. In the north west corner, a rustic bower, consisting of ferns, palms and other exotics, was much admired. This was the handiwork of Mr. Thos. Symington. The exhibits were wholly by members of the society. The attendance was large, and the society will emerge with a small balance to their credit. The show was not gotten up for the purpose of making money, but to stimulate an interest in floriculture and the beautiful in nature. The Citizen's Band discoursed sweet music during the evening. Mr. Walter T. Ross, secretary of the Picton Horticultural Society, honored the society with his presence. Mr. Ross brought with him a lemon of his own growing for exhibition. He expressed himself as delighted with the show.

in the Bald Mountains and we had the pleasure of a visit to Polmateer's ranch, which embraces 4000 acres. The cattle on this ranch were all fat and glossy and we could hardly credit the assertion that they received no grain of any kind. We also met Mr. John Polmateer, who is looked upon as one of the best hunters in that district. John has had many interesting experiences in chasing the deer and hunting the bear, and an evening spent in his company will, "like Oliver Twist's experience with the Parish," give one a taste for more. On Polmateer's ranch there lies, surrounded by high rocks, a pretty sheet of water known as Donahue's lake. It is about a mile in length and a half-a-mile in width. Black bass, pike and masco are said to abound in it, but this was not confirmed by the experience of our party. It is interesting to "hello" from the centre of the lake and listen to the wonderful echos that come back to you from the rockbound shore. A short distance from Polmateer's ranch is the residence of Mr. Brown, the only human habitation in that neighborhood for miles. From a cursory glance from the road at Mr. B's. farm one would be lead to imagine that there was not enough land on the place to give decent sepulchre to the remains of an overgrown tom cat. A look over the place soon disabuses your mind of this idea. Mr. Brown has this year as fine a field of wheat, we venture to say, as there is in the county of Lennox and Addington. Mr. Brown has a lake on his place also. It goes by the name of Little Mitten, and like Donohue lake is full of fish also. But for genuine fishing commend us to the Clare river. There the fish not only abound, but are get-at-able. Black bass, pike, pickerel and masco, and if you are fond of soup, turtles abound. The farms in the vicinity are really excellent and large crops have been garnered this season. On the Clare rivir resides an intelligent old gentleman, Mr. Flannigan, whom we had the pleasure of a talk with. Mr. Flannigan has passed the allotted span, but is still hale and hearty. He settled on his farm fifty years ago, and from an unbroken forest converted it into the well cultivated property it is to-day. Mr. Flanigan's sons are fine, strapping, hospitable gentlemen, whom it is a pleasure to meet. There are a great many Irishmen in this neighborhood and they are all friendly and obliging. We enjoyed our trip, among the gold bearing rocks of Addington immensely and some day may venture back again.

Fall Announcement

1897.

PROSPERITY! PLENTYY!

Heavy Harvests, High Prices, Good Times Back Again.

BETTER TIMES for the dry goods men, too; though never any more high prices for them. We don't pretend to be glad of that. We didn't go into business for the purpose of making things cheap for our fellow-man. Some stores advertise that they did, and you smile, gently. Ours is not a charitable enterprise. We sell cheap, because we have to—because if we didn't sell goods cheapest, some one else would sell them. And we have enough business sense to know that dry goods prices must remain low, and must be lowest in the small towns. So we hope for good times—not from better profits. but from bigger business. You can afford to spend more money this year. We want to get every last cent of it that attractive goods, square dealing and good service, can bring our way. And we've made ready for a big fall business in

DRESS GOODS.

THAT MEANS that we've bought an unusually big stock of dress stuffs; also that we have ventured into some better qualities in dresses than we've usually sold. Each year the dress trade runs more to single dress patterns, and qualities that formerly cost fourteen or fifteen dollars a dress are now thrown in the shade by dresses at five and six dollars. It does not cost anything extra to have the only dress of a certain shade and pattern. We have gone in pretty heavily for pretty single patterns, but we won't wait till the end of the season before we begin to sell them cheap. They are going (and coming) every day now. And we make the deliberate statement that we can show you new dress goods at fifty cents a yard that have more style, more beauty, and more quality, than last year's dollar goods. We welcome ladies that are looking around, and do not urge you overmuch to buy. We claim that we have the best equipped lining and trimming departments in Napanee, and our MISS BARRETT has no superior for stylish dresses or mantles. And that brings in Mantles and Mantle Fabrics.

THE FIRST CONSIGNMENT of our imported mantles will be taken out of bond this week; others are following fast. The chilly evenings hint at mantles and wraps already—suppose you look in and see them. We intend to keep our place as the largest handlers of mantles in our vicinity, and we are proud of these values. Cloakings of most kinds are here already, and are winning much praise. The range of styles is wide, the values exceptional. We are making quick sales in velvets for capes, at prices that most retailers pay for them; and in light-weight cloths for capes and costumes, in which our range is particularly good.

ASSESSMENT INSURANCE.

The failure of the Massachusetts Benefit Association involved a number in this district who will be interested in the following from the New York Tribune. Just before the Association came to an end the assessment was raised to an almost prohibitory amount with the hope of "freezing out" the members. A number of policy holders paid the extra assessment while a great number dropped out without paying it. The question now arises if those members are not liable for the assessment. The following is the article in question:—

"The disastrous failure of the Massachusetts Benefit Life Association, leaving upward of $1,000,000 in unpaid death claims, and thousands of people who are now unable to get insurance on account of age or physical infirmity, calls for serious thought. Do the laws regulating such associations have any value, or is the system itself inherently weak? The insurance laws of Massachusetts have often been referred to as model enactments, and yet the Insurance Commissioner of that State has recently spoken of the failure of this association in a manner that must cause great distrust in their efficiency. He says: "Claimants will be mighty fortunate if they get fifty cents on a dollar." Then he was asked: "Do you think the association would have been all right "financially if the policy-holders had all "paid the last assessment that was "demanded?" He replied emphatically: "No," and with great earnestness he con-"tinued: The results would have been "exactly the same had every single policy-"holder paid all his assessments up to date. "The whole system is wrong."

If Commissioner Merrill is right, something should be done, and done quickly, to protect the rights of people holding assessment certificates in this State. The retirement from this State, or the failure of 238 kindred associations within a few years, as shown in our Albany correspondence of to-day, takes on added significance in the light of Commissioner Merrill's remarks. Add to this the question of the liability of members for unpaid assessments, and the situation is certainly worthy of attention. Repeated decisions by the courts of this and other States suggest the question whether the mere lapsing of a certificate in one of these associations releases a member from liability. The default in the case of the Massachusetts Benefit Life is only partly indicated in the fact that four hundred families of deceased members, beneficiaries under matured certificates, will, in the opinion of the Insurance Commissioner of Massachusetts, "be mighty fortunate if they get fifty cents on a dollar." The failure of this association leaves thousands of people without any protection who have for years paid the account of age or physical weakness, find themselves unable to secure protection elsewhere. The extent of the default in this particular no one can surely estimate. The Insurance Department of this State may properly turn its attention to the subject so far as it affects the interests of the people at large.

Boils, pimples and eruptions, scrofula, salt rheum and all other manifestations of impure blood are cured by Hood's Sarsaparilla.

A Graduate of Toronto University says: "My children have been treated with Scott's Emulsion from their earliest years! Our physician first recommended it and now whenever a child takes cold my wife immediately resorts to this remedy, which always effects a cure."

Mr. Phil Vanalstine landed a 20 lb masco while out cruising in the Dauntless at Hay Bay last Friday. Several members of the party attempt cast an aspersion on Phil's piscatorial prowess by hinting that the fish was in an exhausted condition before he caught the "troll."

Practise Economy in buying medicine as in other matters. It is economy to get Hood's Sarsaparilla because there is more medical value in Hood's Sarsaparilla than in any other. Every bottle of Hood's Sarsaparilla contains 100 doses and will average, taken according to directions, to last a month, while others last but a fortnight.

One of our civic officials while in an American city noticed that milk vendors were comselled to issue milk tickets on the plan of street car tickets, viz, tickets in sheets with perforations between each ticket. "LAGER, ALES UND WINES."

Meaning of "L.A.W. Hotel" as Explained by a Jersey City Man.

Among the many advantages set forth by the L.A.W. to riders to join the organization are the special accommodations extended to members at the official hotels in cities and towns. It is the custom in suburban places for proprietors of official hotels to display a sign like this, "L.A.W. Hotel," in some conspicuous place. Naturally riders patronize the official quarters, and as a consequence the keepers of road houses and hotels in the country are hanging out "L.A.W. Hotel" signs. The practice has been called to the attention of the league and its officers are trying to compel the non-official houses to remove the sign-boards. Complaint was made to the New Jersey division of the league that an hotel keeper on the outskirts of Jersey City not entitled to display the official sign of the L.A.W. was an offender. A visit to the place developed the fact the owner was not disposed to accede to the demands of the league representatives. The latter, finding that mild persuasion was futile, became indignant and threatened legal proceedings. The proprietor, a German, also waxed warm, and in response to the remark that he was using the official sign of the league without authority, retorted:

"Vot I know about veelmen's legs. Dot don't shtand for noddings like dot. Dot sign shtands for lager, ales and wines hotel, alretty yet. Dot my leeg, togedder."

The explanation amused the officials so much that no legal move was taken.—New York Sun.

A Cheap Foundation.

In constructing poultry and other farm buildings it is often desired to make a tight foundation, for the sake of warmth in winter, but not at the expense of a cemented stone or brick foundation. The cut shows an excellent plan. Cedar posts are set where needed, then boarded up inside and out with matched cedar boards. This gives an air space between the boarding that will keep out the wind very effectually. The building can then be set upon the posts, the whole expense for foundation being small. Other wood that does not decay can be used if desired instead of the cedar. A window ought to be put into the foundation on either side, to be kept open in summer to air out the interior. In this way the inner boarding will be much less likely to decay.—N. Y. Tribune.

A CHEAP FOUNDATION.

A Change.

"My wife is very considerate of me," said the young married man. "She was afraid my rest was being interrupted too much, and last week she bought a burglar alarm."

"Does it make a difference?"

"Yes. Instead of getting up to see whether there are burglars in the house, I get up to see whether the alarm is set."—Washington Star.

Home Catechism in Philadelphia.

A good many hundreds and even thousands of long-suffering husbands can bear sorrowful testimony to the fact that this is the sort of catechism the wives of their bosoms subject them to every time they put on their hats to go out in the evening:

"Where are you going?"
"Oh, I'm going out for a few minutes."
"Where?"
"Oh, nowhere in particular."
"What for?"
"Oh, nothing."
"Why do you go, then?"
"Well, I want to go; that's why."
"Do you have to go?"
"I don't know that I do."
"Why do you go, then?"
"Because."
"Because what?"
"Well, simply because."
"Going to be gone long?"
"No."
"How long?"
"I don't know."
"Anybody going with you?"
"No."
"Well, it's strange that you can't be content to stay at home a few minutes. Don't be gone long, will you?"
"No."
"See that you don't."

This is one reason why so many marriages are a dead flat fizzle and failure.—Philadelphia Times.

He Shows Just Cause.

The church was crowded with all the fashion and some of the wit of Saharahurst. The enviable couple stood before the multitude, being made one, and hemmed in by the bridesmaids and ushers beyond the possibility of escape. The solemn ceremony proceeded, interrupted only by the suppressed sobs of the bride's mother, until the minister pronounced the usually perfunctory formula: "If any man can show just cause why they may not lawfully be joined together, let him now speak, or else hereafter forever hold his peace," and was serenely proceeding, when—

"Yes, sir, please, sir, I d—do!" burst upon our astonished ears. The voice was sharp and shrill and broken by emotion, but the crack of doom could not more have startled us. Every eye was directed toward it, and we beheld a small boy in tears, a sailor suit, and struggling in his mother's arms.

"Y-yes, sir, please," he shrieked, "she—she p-promised to w-wait till I grew up and m-marry m-me!"

It Depended.

He—If you won't marry me, I'll go to the Alaska mines.

She—Well, then, I'll tell you when you return.

Reflections of a Bachelor.

When a woman isn't feeling sorry for somebody she is generally washing her hair.

A girl's idea of heaven is a place where her hair is always as wavy as it is when she first takes out her curl papers.

No man can feel sure that he could love only one woman till he has seen all there are.

A girl would a good deal better know what she oughtn't to say than to say what she oughtn't to know.

The world doesn't want to hear your troubles unless you can tell them so as to make it either laugh or cry.

USEFUL IN DODGING CREDITORS.

One of the Advantages Possessed By the Balder Twins.

The Balder twins are in evidence again, and one man is lying awake nights trying to think of a way to conciliate them. It was a put-up job against him, but he doesn't suspect it. He called at the apartment house where the family lived and asked in a disagreeable way to see "young Balder."

The message was given to Harold, who went out into the hall and met a stranger, who, however, seemed to know him very well.

"Now, young sir," he began, "I want this bill settled. You've stood me off long enough, and I don't leave here to-night until I've got the money or security as good as the money."

Harold Balder looked at the man without flinching.

"I never saw you in my life before," he said, with a haughty assumption of supreme indifference. "Will you be so explicit as to inform me what this bill is for?"

"Oh, them high and mighty airs won't go down with me. You owe me for a suit of clothes that you bought last spring, and I want my pay. And I want it now."

"And let me tell you right now that I never patronize a tailor that collects his own bills or sends them in under a year. You are mistaken in the person, my good man."

"Ain't your name Balder?"

"Certainly, but I never bought a suit of clothes from you."

"I've a great mind to thrash you, and I believe I'll just do it. You'll tell the truth and pay that bill, too, when I get through with you."

He had peeled off his coat and turned to clinch Harold, when he threw up his hands in astonishment. Eugene Balder, the other twin, had appeared on the scene, and as the two stood there side by side their own father and mother could not have told them apart.

"I've got 'em again," said the unhappy tailor, rubbing his hands across his eyes.

"Perhaps you have had some dealings with my twin brother," said Harold coolly.

"Why didn't you tell me you had a twin brother?"

"Why didn't you ask me? Now, Gene," turning to his brother, "I suppose this is the person you wanted me to patronize for my wedding suit? Well, my advice is that you pay him off and send him about his business, and I will give my patronage to some first-class establishment, where they don't hound a fellow to death for a few dollars."

"That's dead easy, Harold," said Eugene, "but the bank is closed and father has gone out for the evening."

"It's of no consequence; I'd rather you'd owe them not," gasped the creditor, "and any work you want done I will do it for the most reasonable price and wait your convenience. You see, I mixed you up with another family of the same name who do not pay their bills."

"We are the Balder twins; everybody knows us," said Harold promptly, "there can be no other family of the name."

"No; come to think of it, they were Smith. I hope you'll excuse me."

"Don't mention it," said Harold, as he opened and closed the door after the retreating creditor. Then he looked at Eugene and winked.

"Thanks, awfully," said his twin, "that fellow had it in for me, didn't he?"

"Yes, but you can stand him off awhile longer. If he takes us singly it will be all right, but together we can't bluff him again. It won't work."

A Tall Denial.

Two little boys were quarrelling. One of them made a statement, to which the other hotly replied:

"That's a sixteen story lie, with a roof garden attachment!"

A passerby, appalled by the magnitude of the definition, stopped and said:

"My dear boy, where did you learn that awful expression?"

"Oh," said the little fellow, "I heard papa tell mamma it when she said he was out with the boys."

And the questioner—a married man—

Made a Good Substitute.

It was a hot night, and Mr. McSwat had been unable to sleep.

He came downstairs before anybody else was stirring, and went into the pantry with a dim idea of finding the necessary materials for getting his own breakfast.

A hasty inspection was not reassuring, and he went upstairs again for another wrestle with Morpheus.

An unusually loud yawn awakened Mrs. McSwat.

"What are you doing, Billiger?" she asked.

"Lobelia," he said with another dismal yawn, "what was your idea in covering that large cake in the pantry with a sheet of sticky fly paper?"

Mrs. McSwat sat bolt upright.

"What do you mean?" she demanded. "Who says I put a sheet of fly paper on that cake?"

"I say it," he retorted. "I saw it myself not five minutes ago. Sticky fly paper. White. And covered with flies?"

"Covered with flies?"

"There wasn't room for another fly."

"Billiger!" shrieked Mrs. McSwat, "that isn't fly paper. It's the icing! I'll never making icing again by your mother's recipe as long as I live—so there! Talk to me about——"

But Billiger was half way down the stairs on the way to the barn to wait till the storm blew over.—Chicago Tribune.

Value of Bran and Gluten.

It is not possible to fix hard and fast values, relative or otherwise, for cattle foods. Foods of the same class may be compared on the basis of the relative quantities of digestible dry matter in 100 pounds, but this is not true of unlike foods. Gluten meal is a much more nitrogenous food than wheat bran, and so takes a different place in the ration. Besides, the term gluten meal is applied to materials varying all the way from 20 to 36 per cent. or more of protein. According to results so far reached, Buffalo gluten feed, which usually contains about 25 per cent of protein, is considerably more digestible than wheat bran, the proportion of digestible dry matter in the two being as 75 to 54. It is probably possible to purchase the manurial ingredients of a ton of wheat bran for about $8.50. Those of a ton of Buffalo gluten feed would cost, on the same basis, not more than $9.25. If gluten meal containing more nitrogen were purchased, the manurial value would be larger. The value of the manurial residue from these foods depends, in part, upon the class of animals to which they are fed.—Country Gentleman.

A LETTER FROM INDIA.

The Editor, NAPANEE EXPRESS, Napanee, Ont., Canada.

MY DEAR BRO, — You were kind enough to publish my last circular letter with reference to the famine and our general mission work. Will you kindly give this letter a place in your columns.

The Monsoon which usually begins about the third week in June, was delayed until the second week in July, and the out-look was grave. We feared a continuation of the famine during 1898, but I am glad to tell you that heavy rain has fallen, so that we have received in this part of India nearly twenty-four inches which is the normal rainfall to date. For several days we have had a break which enables the cultivators to finish sowing their fields. Government has made grants on seed-grain, ploughs, cattle and farming implements to the cultivators who have lost everything. I question whether there is another government existing that does so much for the people as the Indian Government. We hope for rain during August and September, and the Government Meteorological Reporter predicts favorably. The sufferings of the people from famine have been indescribable. About eighty millions are affected, and for several months Government was feeding nearly 4,000,000 daily, employing the able-bodied on relief works, and giving gratuitous help to the old and sick. I have visited a number of relief works, and am confident that a better arrangement could not have existed. The natives state that there has been a great deal of dishonesty on the part of native subordinates. Some state that twenty-five per cent has been embezzled. Without doubt there has been a large misappropriation of funds, but this is inevitable where natives handle money Whenever a man has been caught in dishonesty, the government has made

THE OPPOSITION PROGRAM VIEWED FROM THE FARMER'S STANDPOINT.

DEAR EXPRESS—Now that the Leader of the Opposition in the Ontario Legislature and his travelling troupe have first had their say to the people o' Lennox and Addington will you allow me space for a few criticisms, from a farmer's standpoint? Intelligent farmers who went to their meetings on Thursday and gave them a careful hearing must have come away disappointed, if they expected any assurance of needed assistance in any such reforms as the tax-paying farmers of this county are greatly interested in.

Mr. Whitney and his companions in distress in the cold shades of the Opposition in our Provincial politics seem greatly distressed because the farmers and tax-payers' interests are not better guarded; they made a great many fair promises and assurances, but what did we see?

It has been a standing complaint for years past that our Legislature and Government have been too much in the hands of the lawyers and other similar professions, while the farmers whose interests are far more important in the Province than all the others combined are hardly respected at all. Of course the lawyers and their friends have looked out well for THEMSELVES under the circumstances.

When the wolves are selected to "guard the interests" of the sheep it causes no surprise if the wolves come out fat and sleek, and there are generally plenty of them willing to undertake the job. Mr. Whitney and his fellow leaders in the Conservative party have now been holding their meetings for weeks all over the country and pouring it in the ears of the farmers how anxious they all are to get into the Government fold—just to see that their interests are better protected. It turns out, however, that nearly every member of the pack is a well-known lawyer. Not a farmer is found among them, nor did they come to Lennox in the interests of the election of a farmer.

Here are some of the leading lights that have been with the troupe all over the country.

Mr. J. P. Whitney, Q.C., M.P.P., the leader, a well-known Morrisburgh lawyer of many years standing.

Col. Arthur J. Matheson, M.P.P., his lieutenant, a well-known Perth lawyer and the son of a lawyer.

Mr. John W. St. John, M.P.P., another lieutenaut, a well-known Toronto lawyer.

Mr. Oliver A. Howland, M.P.P., another leading light, a well-known Toronto lawyer.

Andrew Miscampbell, M.P.P., of Midland, another leading light, a sort of lawyer and a sort of lumber merchant, I understand but not a farmer.

Dr. Willoughby, M.P.P., a well known village doctor, and race horse owner, of Colborne. but not a farmer.

And so it goes on to the end of the chapter, with lawyers galore and a sprinkling of doctors, like our own Tory member, but not a farmer among them. These are the men who now nominate and recommend THEMSELVES as the most fit and proper persons to administer the affairs and guard the interests of the farmers of Lennox and of all Ontario!

When the sheep get into the power of the wolves they are lucky to escape with the loss of their fleeces merely. The skin and the life-blood generally are relished, too. A lot of intelligent farmers, even in intelligent Lennox, seem anxious to elect a doctor here to help place these lawyers in office. Have we not had enough of lawyer's rule already in Ontario? In consequence of this state of things how does a farmer and his farm fare now, if once dragged into court and subjected to the tender mercies of the lawyers fees and expenses? Do they wish this state of things continued or even made worse?

word to say against this enormous and iniquitous bounty system? Not one word. The fact is Mr. Whitney and his whole party have all along supported that system. He stood up in his place in the House and congratulated the Hardy government when they added the steel bounties, and told them they were adopting such genuine protection principles as he had all the time contended for. The fact is too, that Dr. Meacham, claiming to represent the tax-payers of Lennox, steadily supported the present iron and steel bounties when they were being thus fastened on the tax-payers' necks.

OTHER REFORMS NEEDED.

The farmers interests demand other sweeping reforms. We want the $17,000 to $20,000 now being yearly paid our Lieut. Governor and his house expenses cut down to a figure such as may not be so burdensome to the country. Whitney and all his party, including Dr. Meacham, helped vote down any such proposal when made by the Patrons in the Legislature. We want to see the iniquitous railway free-pass system to the Members of the Legislature stopped. Whitney, St. John, Mathieson, Meacham and all their party united in helping defeat the Patrons on this reform. We want the extension of the jurisdiction of the Division Courts—the poor man's court—to a much larger extent, and its processes so simplified that a plain farmer can go and state his own case there and get as good justice and fair play just as he can go now to the Doctor and state his own case and get a needed remedy. That will stop the necessity of being dragged off to some county town, or to Toronto, and employ a lot of expensive lawyers, often to his bankruptcy or ruin. Need we look for any such reform from a lot of lawyers who now live and grow fat out of farmer's litigations? Has Mr. Whitney or Dr. Meacham ever proposed any such needed reforms in the Legislature or on the platform? Never. We much need a reform in our present system of appointing Provincial officers and the reduction of their salaries and expenses. Such offices should not be parcelled out, as they now are, to the mere party hacks and heelers or to some of their families or favorite friends. Who ever heard of Whitney and his present travelling troop, or even of Dr. Meacham, as our representative, supporting any such needed reform?

The fact is these men now go about telling the same old story at every place about that Central Prison piggery, about the "tyranny" of the Minister of Education, about that terrible mining policy, that Forestry Commission and the like, but when it comes to the REALLY NEEDED reforms such as the electors of Lennox want and have long felt the need of they are as silent as dumb dogs. They have had years of opportunity to support these reforms in the Legislature and have never done it. Who expects they ever will?

The farmers have selected for years and years lawyers and doctors to represent their interests in the Legislature and we all know what has come out of it. Shall we go on repeating that folly?

The Napanee Express

NAPANEE, FRIDAY, SEPT. 17th 1897.

THE question whether a hotelkeeper can dispense soft drinks on Sunday is being debated. If the worst comes to the worst the traveller can drink water, but the average man has a decided aversion to drinking water away from home.

THE Patrons of Industry met in Toronto last week and an active campaign during the next Provincial election was decided upon. The Patrons are no longer a force in politics and it seems to us the effort to revive the movement is doomed to failure.

AMONG the latest rumors it is said that Sir. Oliver Mowat will become Lieutenant Governor of Ontario and that Hon. David Mills will be appointed Minister of Justice. Sir Oliver's retirement to the Lieutenant Governorship of the Province, whose affairs he administered so long and well would be a fitting close to an honorable and active political career.

THE Mail and Empire is fearfully and wonderfully edited these days. A short time ago it was assailing Mr. Laurier because he had granted a preference to Great Britain without receiving any favor in return. Now it is attacking him on the ground that no preference has been granted to Great Britain. The Mail and Empire is jumping from pillar to post in a manner that would be amusing if it was not so contemptible.

IN a wild attempt to score the Ontario Government the Mail and Empire draws attention to the fact that the Fort Erie Jockey Club imported a number of Pinkerton detectives to prevent fakers from fleecing innocent people during the progress of the meet. This the Mail chararterizes as a direct stab at the Canadian police by the Government. We direct the Mail's attention to another flagrant outrage of the Government. A Pinkerton detective is at precent in Napanee engaged in ferretting out the Dominion Bank robbery. We trust the Mail will hold the Government up to public execration for tolerating such a state of affairs. Let the Mail and Empire continue in the good work of exposing the wicked deeds of the Hardy Government. Home talent must be protected from the inroads of the Pinkertonians even if fakers flourish and robbers go unwhipped of justice.

HE WONDERS WHY.

To the Editor of THE NAPANEE EXPRESS.

About four months ago a petition was circulated throughout the town asking the citizens to donate funds for the purchase of some instruments to form a Citizen's Band, a clause in that document intimating their intention of furnishing free weekly concerts.

Our band we may be justly proud of as the concerts which have been rendered have convinced the most skeptical of the vast improvement this organization has undergone during the past two months. We have had no open air concerts for three weeks.

Rumor says that Mr. Stevens the late director and some other members have resigned. Why? I cannot speak with authority on the matter, but must say Napanee cannot afford to lose such musicians and it behoves the management to see to it that all available musicians are are kept in the ring, that we may still have a band second to none in Central Ontario.

Yours Truly.

dishonesty, the government has made an example of him by punishing him very severely, which only made the others more careful not to be caught. The loss of life has been great. Out of 500 children whom we have rescued 100 died after all the care we gave them. It was impossible to save all. The people would remain in their villages until they were forced by hunger to leave, and many preferred death to the poor houses notwithstanding the excellent arrangements. Many of the people were afraid to lose their caste, and had suspicions that their religion would be interfered with. The officials have spared no pains to try to save the people, and the loss to the government from this famine will exceed £8,000,000. It will be years before the country will recover.

India has been terribly afflicted this year from famine, plague, earthquake and riots. There is a feeling of unrest among the educated classes, and disaffection towards the government is known to exist widely, but the Indian Government is holding the country with a firm yet prudent hand. A number of leading editors of the native press are undergoing trial for sedition, and it is quite possible that the native press will be controlled in future. But the disaffection does not extend to the village population which is eighty per cent of the whole though in their ignorance they might be used as tools of the disaffected, educated men.

The riots among Mohammedans and Hindus in Calcutta were caused by a quarrel over a piece of property on which stood an old mosque which was bought by a Hindu. But instead of the rioters attacking Hindus, they attacked Europeans. The riots were soon quelled, and the ring-leaders have been punished. In Poona two European officers were shot on Jubilee night while returning from Government house. The perpetrators of the crime have not been found, the plot is supposed to be very deep.

The out-break of fanaticism among the tribes in the Swat Valley on the northern frontier was very unexpected. They were led by a mad Mohammedan priest who stirred fanaticism. Eight thousand British troops are now in the valley, and 3,000 tribesmen have lost their lives. The whole valley will be thoroughly subjugated.

The events of the year have greatly interfered with mission work. Hungry people do not care to listen to the gospel, they want bread. A crowd of fanatics and rioters are not good listeners, still the work has gone on quietly. The poor people have been convinced more than ever of the love of christians to them shown by the help given them in their distress, and this seed must bring forth fruit. We have gone from village to village, from door to door, distributing help sent us by friends in England and America, and in this way have been able to get very near to the people in their trouble. Hundreds of orphans have been rescued and these will grow up intelligent christians, in mission schools. For months to come the help of our friends in England and America will be needed to aid the people until better times come. Our special need at present is scholarships for famine orphans at $20 a year each, which may be sent to us direct, or by foreign post-office order, or bank draft.

things continued or even made worse?

Turn out the present Government, in which there are now two practical working farmers, the Hon. John Dryden, Minister of Agriculture, and the Hon. E. J. Davis, Provincial Secretary, with honest Hon. W. Harty, not a lawyer by any means, as Minister of Public Works, and put in their places a whole gang of hungry lawyers and doctors, and will the farmers interests be better cared for? Does it look to reason?

These men have been here for the express purpose of trying to defeat the election of a well-known practical and hard working farmer, Bowen E. Aylsworth Esq., and electing in his stead a village doctor who is always their faithful follower in the Legislature.

SOME REFORMS WE NEED.

Now, here are some of the many reforms needed by the farmer-taxpayers just now. Can we look to the present Tory leaders to get them?

The present bonus system should be stopped. Like the iniquitous pension system in the States, the evil grows worse and worse and threatens to become a veritable mill-stone about the necks of the actual farmer. In the States some years ago one party began to buy up all those interested in pensions and paid them off well out of the public treasury. Then the other party went them one better and increased the pensions and added to the number getting the money. So it has gone on, a race between the rival parties until now, thirty-five years after the American war, there are far more on the pension list than in the beginning and over one hundred and forty millions of the peoples taxes are being squandered on pensions each year. Now too the evil has become so great and so fixed that neither set of party leaders dare try to stop it. Too many are interested and the tax-payers are being bled unmercifully. Years ago in Canada a Tory Government put a bounty of $1 a ton on Canadian pig iron. That bought the interested support of a good many. After another election that bounty was raised to $2 a ton, and a good many more were thus bought over, for there are men living in almost every county in Canada that have some interest in iron ore lands. Then came in the Liberals at Ottawa and they found so many interested it was to their interest to raise that bounty to $3 a ton, where it now stands. Meantime our Ontario Government put a bounty of $1 on all Ontario pig iron, and a year or two ago, added a bounty on Ontario steel on the back of all that.

What interest have the farmer taxpayers of Lennox in paying a few iron manufactures in some of our cities these $4 on every ton of iron turned out, and $1 extra if that iron is made into steel? Does it not add that much to the burden of all our taxation? Does it add one dollar to the value of our farms? Does it not induce men to leave legitimate farming and invest in ore lands and in wild-cat iron-smelting? Suppose 500 tons a day gets manufactured under this spoon-fed system; that means $2000 every day additional taxation, or $730,000 a year, or more than the assessed value of one of our old townships.

Does the Whitney company have one that folly?

ONE HONEST MAN

DEAR EDITOR—Please inform your readers, that if written to confidentially, I will mail, in a sealed letter, particulars of a genuine, honest, home cure, by which I was permanently restored to health and manly vigor, after years of suffering from nervous debility, sexual weakness, night losses and weak shrunken parts. I was robbed and swindled by the quacks until I nearly lost faith in mankind, but thank heaven I am now well, vigorous and strong, and wish to make this certain means of cure known to all sufferers. I have nothing to sell and want no money, but being a firm believer in the universal brotherhood of man, I am desirous of helping the unfortunate to regain their health and happiness. I promise you perfect secrecy.

Better and Easier Work Done By Diamond Dyes.

The dyeing of cotton rags for the making of carpets, mats and rugs was for a long time a tedious, difficult and unsatisfactory operation owing to the crude and old fashioned dyestuffs that home dyers were obliged to use.

Of late years all this has been changed for the advantage and benefit of every home. Science has given the world the Diamond Dyes that have brought joy and comfort to millions of housewives.

The makers of the celebrated Diamond Dyes prepare special cotton colors such as Fast Pink, Fast Orange, Fast Purple, Fast Garnet, Fast Navy Blue, Fast Crimson, Fast Seal Brown, Fast Yellow, Fast Scarlet, Fast Cardinal, Fast Black and other colors that are unfading in washing, and fast in rain or sun. No other dyes in the world can give such wonderful results on cotton goods, and no others but the Diamond Dyes are fully guaranteed.

The Man in Debt.

There is no greater spur to a young man of acute intellect and sound health than a thumping debt of, say, $50,000. How inferior are the novels written by Balzac before he had incurred great obligations to those written in hope of freedom from his debt! Furthermore, a man who owes a large sum of money seems to be respected by the butcher, baker and candle-stick maker more than the thrifty, anxious soul who is disquieted by a trifling unpaid bill. The audacious debtor is pointed out to strangers, not derisively, not with the fingers of reproach, but as a historical building, a landmark in the community. He wears the best clothes, eats and drinks sumbustiously, sits in the chief seats in the theatre, and as a rule spends the summer on a steam yacht. The man who owes $50,000 is far better off, so far as this world goes, than the man who owes $50. Are there not banks that lend cheerfully to him who already owes them $50,000, fearing possibly that, if angered by refusal, the debtor will never pay even a portion of the original debt? Yes, a man of acute intellect and sound body should contract as soon as possible after he starts in business a thumping debt. The only trouble is the difficulty in finding anyone who will lend the first $50,000. We have not found him yet, and we have been searching for him since 1879.—Boston Journal.

Insuring Workingmen.

The German Government provides a system of compulsory insurance for working men. Under this system a workman 20 years of age pays an equivalent of 40 cents a week for three years, and at the age of 65 he receives the sum of $77, in the meantime having had an insurance against accidents. The annual premium is divided into three parts, one of which is paid by the workman, another by his employer and the third by the state. The report for 1895 shows that 18,389,000 persons were insured under the law, of whom 3,400,000 were employes in shops and factories, 12,290,000 were employed in agriculture and 690,000 were in the employ of the state. In that year the number of accidents was 74,897, of which 6448 terminated fatally. The total expense of the system for the year was $13,400,000.

"Dog Walkers."

"Dog walkers" and hotel portresses are among the new fields opened up to women in England. Certain families have dogs who need exercising. Now the dog walker calls at their homes and presents a card on which is printed "Miss So-and-So, Walker of Dogs." For so much a month she guarantees to take "doggie" and trot him about the streets twice a day, each trip to consume twenty minutes. All of this she does for 3 shillings a week. And some women are now earning quite a good livelihood in this fashion.

Canadian Parks.

With wise forethought the Canadian Government has set apart a number of islands and parts of islands, from Kingston, Ont., to Alexandria Bay, for park purposes. This has been done on the understanding that the state of New York would set aside tracts of land of equal extent on the American side. The lands put aside for common use in Canada are for fishermen, campers, and pleasure-seekers generally.—Chicago Times-Herald.

A Cure That Was Permanent.

The Medicine Used Was Paine's Celery Compound.

Day after day home and foreign cures are heralded as the result of using this or that medicine. It is safe to assert that many of the published letters are bogus, and others will hardly bear the light of investigation.

The cures effected by Paine's Celery Compound, and noted in the press of the country, have all the ring of genuineness and honesty about them, and the original letters can be seen at any time by an interested public.

It has also been proven in numberless instances that the cures made by Paine's Celery Compound are permanent. Another letter has just been received, this time from Mr. P. J. Kilbride, Postmaster, Inverness, P. E. I., testifying to the permanency of his cure. His case was one of the most serious and critical ever given to the public and his complete cure astonished his many friends and the residents of his town.

Mr. Kilbride says: "Over three years ago I gave you a testimonial for Paine's Celery Compound after it had cured me.

"To day I am in splendid condition, and have not been sick a single day since I used the famous Paine's Celery Compound.

"I certainly owe my present health and strength to your medicine, and I am fully convinced it saved me from a condition bordering on insanity. I can now sleep and eat well, and I thank God for Paine's Celery Compound and the great change.

"I have received and answered 250 letters since my testimonial was published.

These letters came from all parts of Canada and the United States. It has been a pleasure answering these letters from sufferers, and I trust my recom-

SURE TEST OF DEATH.

FRENCH SCIENTISTS' INTERESTING EXPERIMENTS IN PHOTOGRAPHY.

An Immersion Process—Hand Placed in Acid Bath and Then on a Bromide Plate—Use of Digital Effluvia—Easily Recognized on a Plate.

Since the discovery of the X-rays we have become accustomed to all manner of surprises in photography, and if these successive discoveries interest us nothing mysterious or marvellous astonishes us any longer. During the last sessions of the Biological Society, one of the most learned practitioners, Dr. Luigs, a member of the Academy of Medicine, read a paper on the subject of some new experiments in photography.

In collaboration with Mr. David, the Doctor had succeeded in fixing permanently and distinctly on a photographic proof the effluvia from the fingers of an adult enjoying perfect health. To obtain this result the two savans shut themselves in a dark room with their subject. The hand which was to be experimented upon was placed in a bath of hyroquinone; the palmar sides of the fingers were then placed on a photographic plate covered with bromide of silver. The pose should last from fifteen to twenty minutes to be successful. The bromide plate, treated in the usual manner, furnished a proof as curious as it was instructive.

The extreme tips of the fingers could be seen forming a variegated spot, standing out in bold relief from the circumference of effluvia which surrounded them. In the upper left hand corner of the plate could be seen a fragment of skin, which had become detached in the strong acid bath, and which gave out direct effluvia under the form of vertical threads like sheaves. All the tiny white spots seen on the black background of the proof represent the effluvium dust floating in the hydroquinone bath.

In reply to some criticisms Dr. Luigs isolated two fingers from direct contact

IS NOT A NEW WOMAN.

SHE ISN'T EMANCIPATED AND DOESN'T WANT TO BE.

The Southern Woman Revolves Around Man, Wishes to so Revolve, and Is Determined to Revolve Around Him Only, Let Others Do as They May.

The typical Southern woman is purely feminine, says The New York Sun. Whether by nature worldling or puritan, self-contained or impetuous, bred in the cotton lands or in the confines of town or city, she is an out-and-out loyalist where man is concerned. She drew in the doctrine of masculine ascendency with her earliest breath.

You may be sure that the typical Southern woman would never employ a woman physician, attorney, or undertaker, nor, least of all, sit under a woman minister. If the men who stand in immediate relation to her show weakness where she looked for strength, or wickedness where only good was expected—if they fail to steer the household bark in safe and pleasant waters, and otherwise prove faithless to their trust—she covers up their shortcomings as best she can, even from herself, and ascribes such failures to adverse circumstance. She must keep her ideals. She loves even where she cannot approve, and condones things contrary to every fibre of her nature.

"It is all as plain as daylight to me," said a Southern woman recently visiting this city. "Man's province in life is to do, and woman's is to be; to be pretty, for instance, or at least as pretty as she can, and to be agreeable. I regard being agreeable as woman's primary business in life, because so much else, that seems more important just at first glance, depends on it. If a woman just lays herself out to be agreeable to her husband, and manages, besides, to inspire her son, if she has a son, with the desire to do something worth doing, worth having been created for, and contrives to make him comprehend something of the value of life, I'm sure that's doing a heap more good in the world than mixing up with voters and bothering with politics."

In the typical Southern household the masculine factor is the pivot about which everything else revolves. The masculine factor may be represented by a mere youth of seventeen; may be only a baby boy, or may be an infirm great uncle or irritable guardian or grandfather; it is all the same. Whether husband, cousin, brother-in-law, son, or even relation by courtesy the male factor predominates.

"We would rather not have breakfast so late Sunday mornings, it makes us get to church late, but Uncle Billy never breakfasts before half-past 9, and he likes us all to be at the table," said a young Southern woman in relating a household incident to the writer.

"But I should prepare everything nicely for him and leave his breakfast with the cook, and consult my own conveni-

BETTER THAN GOLD

IS THE RARE TREASURE OF PERFECT HEALTH.

A Nova Scotia Lady Says "I Consider Dr. Williams' Pink Pills a Priceless Boon to suffering Humanity."

From the Amherst, N.S., Sentinel.

The rugged and the strong do not appreciate to its full extent the blessing of perfect health. It is only those who have passed through a trying illness, who feel that health is a treasure to be prized more than silver or gold. Among those who have experienced the truth of this is Miss Sabra Rector, of West River Herbert, N.S. This lady has passed through a trying and wearisome illness, from which happily relief was found through the medium of a medicine that has brought health and strength to thousands of others, and whose medicinal virtues will work equally good results in all cases where it is given a fair trial. Miss Rector says:—"I feel it is my duty to recommend Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, as they have done wonders for me. About two years ago I became very ill with a complication of diseases. I was suffering with indigestion, biliousness and the resulting nervous disorders, such as sick headache, loss of appetite, and flushes of heat and cold. I began doctoring, and although I had the best of care I seemed to grow worse every day. I slept but little and when lying down would grow so hot and suffer from a sensation of smothering that I would find it necessary to arise. Then the other extreme would come and I would shiver with cold. Time wore on and there was no improvement in my condition. I was not able to do any work about the house and even the exertion of moving about would tire me out. If I attempted to walk any distance or hurried in the least I would gasp for breath and could scarcely speak. I had a very poor appetite, and what food I ate did not seem to agree with me or furnish needed nourishment, and I also suffered with a severe pain in my side and back. During this time I tried many remedies, but they gave me no relief whatever. I had become so weak, and my system was so run down that life was a burden to me. At this stage my attention was directed to Dr. Williams' Pink Pills and I determined been a pleasure answering these letters from sufferers, and I trust my recommendation of Paine's Celery Compound will help suffering humanity."

BERRY BULLETIN.

M. A. Thayer on the Best Work For the Month of September.

The bearing season being over, the delight of unfolding leaf, bud and blossom past, the fruit matured, and the appetite satisfied, we are apt to neglect the very means of future success.

Remember, two seasons of good work are necessary to produce best crops of berries.

The babyhood of the plant requires careful nursing in the spring. The childhood of the plant careful training and protection in the fall, and the mature or exhausted plant, care at all times.

The berry plant gives you fruit but once. All the energy, and even life itself, are offered up in its wonderful effort to produce fruit and seed. It then dies, and should be removed and burned.

Nature knowing the sacrifice, provides a new growth from the roots and repeats its efforts again and again.

The neglect of a plant at any stage of growth carries the result through life just as surely as with a child or other animal growth.

After fruiting, the roots of plants should be nursed back into vigorous life, by cutting out all old and surplus growth, cultivate thoroughly, and give a good dressing of fine manure or wood ashes.

This best prepares them for resisting the cold winters of the north, and stimulates them for active work in the early springs of the south.

It is sometimes desirable to propagate your own plants. If so, select strong, new growth of currants and grapes, as soon as the leaves fall cut in pieces about eight inches long, each piece containing three buds. Set in long straight rows, eight or ten inches apart, leaving top bud near the surface of the ground. Cultivate and keep free from weeds. Good one year plants are thus made the following season.

For black raspberries, bury the tips of the cane as soon as it naturally bends to the ground, leave until spring, when it is ready to detach and transplant.

Plants from the blackberry and red raspberry are usually taken from the sprouts, or suckers that come up between the rows or around the hill, considerable care being necessary in digging the plants.

Root cuttings make best plants. Select strong roots in spring or fall, cut in pieces about five inches long, and sow in drills about three feet apart.

The gooseberry being more difficult to propogate, should be mounded up, covering the hill except the tips of the branches, these branches are removed, made into cuttings and set out the same as currants.

There is no more fascinating work than the propagation of plants.

floating in the hydroquinone bath.

In reply to some criticisms Dr. Luigs isolated two fingers from direct contact with the plate. The result was a proof with three impressions, similar to the first proof, and two others not so well developed, but nevertheless convincing.

"It can be seen," said the Doctor, "that this new method of producing photographs by immersion is susceptible of fruitful results, both in physiology and pathology. Its application is simple, it requires no complicated apparatus and can be practised by any one with some knowledge of photography."

The variations of this nervous force, which is incessantly ejected from the tips of the fingers, may be gauged, according to the age, the sex, the different phases of the day and the emotions which are agitating the human subject.

Thus the study of these effluvia, their density, their diminution, will permit us to experiment in the domain of the phenomena of sensibility, and perhaps also that of motivity, as we are still ignorant of their intrinsic physiological characteristics. The Doctor believes that certain temperaments, certain professions even, may present special phenomena for examination. He has proofs of the fingers of a pianist and of a massageur, which are absolutely curious. The effluvia of the massageur are violently accentuated; they jut out in globules of variable sizes and are very characteristic. Between the fingers of the pianist are seen fine filaments, which described odd and distinctly marked curves.

But the real advantage of Dr. Luigs' discovery is the fact that he has enriched science by giving it a positive means of determining death.

She Remembered Him.

ly for him and leave his breakfast with the cook, and consult my own convenience," protested her friend.

"And leave him to breakfast alone, the only day he has to himself?"

The tone and manner with which this was said showed plainly that such a solution of the problem was utterly impossible. The Uncle Billy alluded to was not a vital factor in this household. His orphan nieces owned their home, and he simply lived with them, and upheld the family dignity. You may be sure that his room was the sunniest and most accessible in the house, and his favorite corner by the sitting room fire a veritable harbor of comfort, with slippers and well-filled tobacco appliances kept always near at hand.

In a Southern city where it is against convention for women to be out after nightfall without escorts, a party wishing to go to church, or to visit, or to walk, and having no man to call on, borrows some small nephew or cousin or neighbor for the purpose, no matter how young or how immature he may be, and sets off satisfied now that this masculine shape attends it.

"Why do you not go out? The fresh air will do you good," was urged once on sisters scarcely over the first shock of a bereavement.

"We haven't decided about our mourning yet. It is not made up."

"Well, why not decide? It is suicidal for you to stay so close indoors."

"Well, the mantua maker suggests a four-inch crepe border for our Henrietta gowns, and Louisa thinks it would be better to have them plain. Brother Tom is to come on again from Atlanta soon, and he will decide for us."

Brother Tom came on and decided. He decided in favor of plain-bordered Henriettas, but, having a wife and large family of his own to care for, it is possible that he did not give the serious consideration to the matter that it deserved. His three sisters, however, one of whom held his gloves and hat, while another one rubbed the obstinate spot off his vest and listened breathlessly to his account of his last attack of neuralgia, felt sure that there could be no other brother in the world half so kind and sympathetic and interesting. Family ties are strong in the South.

In the same city there is a middle-aged woman to whom maturity has brought, apparently, only additional charm. Here is a beautiful nature, but she has never married, and why? Because the man of all others whom she cared for long ago her brother did not like. He was a good enough man as men go. There were no fundamental objections to his character or social standing, but her brother did not like him, so she gave him up. There are traces of such "giving up" discernible about many other Southern women today.

Acquiescence to masculine authority does not desert the Southern woman, even when she is a grandmother, or, perhaps, a great-grandmother. Her pride in her son's praise of her new gown or cap is almost girlish, and her face flushes with pleasure when he tucks the carriage robes tenderly about her and expresses concern as to whether her sunshade is large enough to ward off the afternoon sun.

"Don't drive fast, Tony, mother does not like it," he charges, and although "mother" may own the equippage and the ground over which she will drive, and knows perfectly well that her orders might be law, she is happy, because her masculine divinity has elected to regulate her life for her.

If a woman holds the purse in the typical Southern household, and there are boys and girls to be educated from the scant funds, the utmost effort will be made to give the boys every chance. The girls need advantages, too, but it is felt that they could get along without them better than the boys.

The native-born Southern woman enjoys being pleasant. It is blind instinct with her to smile cordially on the girl who sells her postage stamps, and to utter some truism to the elevator boy as they swing upward that will bring a shade of interest to the automatic face. Some portion of this exuberance of temperament gets ground off when the world rubs against her; she learns to be not so much in earnest and not so dependent. She gets so that she can make a tolerable bargain, too, and even master the first, the very first beginnings of the art of "pushing," but, that femininity of hers rarely gets rubbed out. It seems to be in the bone.

Shortness of Breath. "Since last year I have had serious heart trouble caused by malaria. Shortness of breath, smothering spells on retiring, violent palpitation, etc., often made me gasp for breath. On procuring Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills I found to my surprise and delight that they gave almost instant relief. I got healthy, restful sleep, my heart trouble disappeared, and I now feel very well and strong indeed." Mr. Hugh Moore, Ingersoll, Ont., makes this statement for my attention was directed to Dr. Williams' Pink Pills and I determined to give them a trial. After using four boxes I felt so much better that hope and encouragement came to me once more. I continued the use of the Pink Pills and found myself steadily gaining health and strength. By the time I had used four boxes more I had fully regained health and strength and I am not only able to do my full share of household work, but also attend to my Sabbath school class and other church duties. I look upon Dr. Williams Pink Pills as a priceless boon to suffering humanity."

How Water a Sovereign Remedy.

The other day a woman in a country town was dismayed by the appearance of her young son, borne into the house by friendly hands, and suffering from one of the common accidents of children.

In coasting he had managed to fall in such a way that one leg was caught between two swiftly moving sleds and was, in consequence, dreadfully bruised and now becoming rapidly discolored. His mother remembered that one of the summer boarders, whom she had entertained six months before, had told her to use hot water for such disasters. Here was an opportunity to try the remedy.

She immediately plunged the wounded member into a foot-tub of water as hot as the child could bear, and added more from time to time, as it cooled. This treatment was faithfully followed out, with such rapid effects that by the next day the little fellow was walking about the house, and able to use his injured leg, not freely, but enough for purposes of locomotion.

Its entire cure was a matter of a very short time, and it is not to be wondered at that that family now "swear by" hot water as a liniment. It will be found, used in the same way, equally efficacious for inflammations, for sprains, and should be called upon in any such emergency, and if the swelling is very bad, add vinegar.—Philadelphia Press.

One or the Other.

A certain English Duke, while driving from the station to the park on his way to inspect a company of artillery, observed a ragged urchin keeping pace with his carriage at the side.

His Grace, being struck with the cleanliness of the lad, asked him where he was going, the lad replying:

"To the park, to see the dook and sogers."

The Duke, feeling interested, stopped his carriage and opened the door to the lad, saying he could ride with him to the park.

The delighted lad, being in ignorance as to whom he was riding with, kept His Grace interested with his quaint remarks till the park gates were reached.

As the carriage entered it was saluted by the company and guns. Whereupon His Grace said to the lad:

"Now, can you show me where the Duke is?"

The lad eyed his person over, and then looking at the Duke, replied quite seriously:

"Well, I dunno, mester, but it's either me or you."

KITCHEN MANAGEMENT.

Lots of Trouble Saved By a Little Forethought and Method.

The great point of good management in the kitchen is to clean things away as you go on, and to be one day ahead in ordering necessaries. For instance, take the every-day want of tea and sugar. At starting, order in two packets of each, and as one packet is cleared, order in another, so you will always be prepared for an emergency, and the servant will not be called away from her regular work to "run to the grocer's." The kitchen, managed by some cooks, is everlastingly in a muddle, because things, after they have been used, are left here, there and everywhere, instead of being washed and put away in their proper places. The mistress of the house should insist upon order in the kitchen, and also that her cook should get ahead with vegetables—at least in preparing them—before they are wanted; that is to say, with regard to potatoes, try to get them pared early in the day, and don't leave the shelling of peas when in season until the last moment. A dinner is often spoiled through vegetables being insufficiently cooked. It is the fashion in some houses to put a kitchen clock on at least ten minutes, a plan that is worth following when the cook has a tendency to be late. It is wonderful what a lot of trouble will be saved by a little forethought and method in the kitchen; and how time is economized if every vessel is in its right place. Sometimes one sees the sink laden with dirty pudding basins, milk jugs, knives and forks and other things besides. Cooks will leave stale pieces of bread about, and choppers and boards with fragments of meat still clinging to them. This is all very untidy and very unnecessary. One great secret of success in cooking is to have everything clean and fresh; another is: "Never put off till the last anything that can be done beforehand;" thirdly, keep a wary eye upon the clock.—Madame.

Tips on Darning.

The scenery of this homely art lies in running the thread of the darning cotton so far on each side of the hole that it does not immediately fray and pull out the goods.

Take a long thread of darning cotton to begin with and run it at least half an inch along the goods on each side of the hole. Continue this until the hole is snugly covered. Now cross these threads in regular darning style, taking care that the same precaution is observed. A stocking darned in this way will wear, as far as the darning is concerned, as long as if no hole had existed.

To darn very large holes, such as are likely to occur from having been pulled or frayed out in the laundry, something more than a thread of darning cotton may be necessary, and a patch must be used. Such holes almost surely occur in the heel, as this part of a stocking is usually worn thin first and is more likely to fray.

In treating of the method of mending them it is safe to take the heel for a model.

From the leg of an old stocking, such as is sure to be found in your basket, cut a kite-shaped piece of goods about five inches long and four inches across. Turn the stocking wrong side out and lay the kite upon the heel so that the long pointed end runs up the back of the leg and the lower rounded part is at the base of the heel.

Run a stout linen thread down the centre of the kite, taking large, loose stitches. Now run in the same way across the kite-shaped piece, letting the thread be very slack. The next step is to sew the patch lightly to the heel by stitching it around the outside. If deftly done there will be neither wrinkle nor crease to tell the wearer that so important an operation had ever taken place.

Beautiful and Happy Homes.

The very word "home" touches every fiber of the soul and strikes every chord of the human heart with its angelic fingers; it is the heart's garden. The sweetest type of heaven is a beautiful home; it should be the most delightful place on earth, the centre of the purest affections and most desirable associations, as well as of the most attractive and exalted beauties to be found this side of paradise. Nothing can excel in beauty or sublimity the quietude, peace, affection and happiness of a well ordered home, where virtue is nurtured and every good principle sustained. There

PROPER METHODS FOR THOSE WOMEN WHO PAINT AND POWDER.

How the Trick Is Done to Secure the Most Artistic Results—Several Things to Be Considered if This Effect Is to Be Attained.

The correct putting on of powder and paint comes in for its share of the minute and devoted attention bestowed today on every portion of my lady's well-groomed anatomy. Facial blemishes are no longer accepted with patience. Women feel as amply able to overcome nature's blunders regarding their complexions as regarding the color of their hair or the size of their waist. The head of a fashionable school for artistic "make-ups" said, when asked to talk about her work and methods, says The New York Sun:

"Since women will paint, powder, and make themselves up, it is much better for them to do it artistically. By that I mean to do it in such a manner as to make them as attractive looking as possible, and not the unnatural-looking highly-colored creatures one meets so often.

"The great trouble with the majority of women is that they make up by gaslight or in a shaded room. Then when they go out on the streets or in the daylight they are more objects of ridicule than admiration. If you want to understand me follow a 'made-up' woman into a store and see the effect of the change of light. In the full light of the street she is ghastly, with her splotches of red and white and dark ringed eyes. In the half light of the store the change is a marked improvement, and the woman often appears very good looking, without a suggestion of paint or powder.

"'Make-up' for the daylight should always be done with a handglass before a window where the brightest possible light will strike the face. And for this 'make-up' one must never use dry or grease rouge. It invariably shows purple by daylight. Pink and white powder must also be avoided, and only the cream colored be used. Pink powder gives the skin a most unnatural lilac tint, which, in the winter, when the face becomes cold, dampens almost to a purple. White has a greenish, ghastly effect. A clever woman puts on powder to smooth and refine her complexion, not to whiten it, and for that reason she selects a shade of cream powder as near as possible the natural color of the skin.

"Other points that a clever woman is careful about in put coloring just in on which a woman may intensify her 'make-up' without arousing suspicion; for instance, when she has been on some exciting expedition. As a matter of fact, excitement makes most women pale, but there are some few who gain color and brilliancy by it. The pale woman may paint to imitate her more fortunate sister on such occasions. Still, this should be done with the utmost care, for it is a thousand times beter to put on too little than too much. The great crime of women who make-up is using inferior materials and putting them on carelessly. The first hurts their own skins, the second hurts other people's eyes. So I say if women will make-up, and many of them will do it, they should be taught to use the proper materials and how to put them on."

THE GARROTE.

Spain's Horrifying Method of Executing Condemned Murderers.

The garrote by which the anarchist who killed the Spanish Premier was executed was named after its inventor, a Spanish iron worker, who witnessed a bungling execution of a relative on the gallows, which was the method employed by Spain up to about thirty years ago for carrying out the sentence of death.

home, where virtue is nurtured and every good principle sustained. There is nothing like system in the school room or in the home; have a place for everything and let everything be kept neat and orderly; it saves time and labor. Yet, the truest beauty of any home is the pleasant face, kind words and helping hands.

Home should not be regarded as a place where the family merely eat, drink and sleep, but the spot to which the tired husband longs to return when the day's duties release his claim. To the man of business home should be an earthly paradise. Thrice happy is the man who finds solace and comfort in his home.

In the happy home one finds industry, sympathy and government, but love must be the director. Kind words, gentle acts and a sweet disposition makes glad the heart where peace and blessings dwell. Every true wife will strive to cultivate these principles.

Each one must do his or her part, for it is unity that makes the happy home. The influence of a beautiful home is felt not only by its own inmates, but by everyone who shares its hospitality.

skin.

"Other points that a clever woman is careful about is not coloring just in front of the ears. In nature that spot is always white. Neither does she cover that uneven white spot in the middle of the cheek; but she is always very careful to let the color extend under the jaw and chin. If you will notice a child you will see that its color seems to spread from the jaw up and under. So the color should be put on a shade deeper there than on any other part of the face.

"To begin at the beginning, the first thing to do in making up is to wash the face with soap and water, cold water and some good soap that suits the skin. After the face has been gently dried apply the rouge with a spunge on the jaw. Then with the fingers rub it up and out, spreading it as evenly as possible. Then touch the under part of the chin with the sponge and rub it up with the fingers. The next step is to put on the powder. This must be done with a bit of rag, lamb's wool is best, and rubbed in with the fingers as was the rouge. I don't know why, but the fingers seem to be the only thing that will properly blend the colors on the face. Powder should be carefully applied and only to those parts which are naturally white. Never put it over the rouge except around the edges where blending is necessary, and above all things never have rouge so distinct that one may tell where it begins and ends. There are no deciding lines, excepting the brows and lashes, in a face artistically made up.

"Now, having the powder and paint on, we will go to the eyes and brows. That is very delicate work, which requires patience and skill. Rub the fingers over the brows, smoothing down the hairs. Then, with the tiny brush which comes with every box of eyebrow coloring, color the brows, being careful to touch only the hairs, never the skin. Then open the eyes wide, and with the same little brush color both the upper and lower lashes. As that is the end of that little box's usefulness we will put it aside and take up the blue pencil. This is only an ordinary blue carpenter's or editor's pencil, and quite soft. With this make the slightest mark at the outer corner of the eyes and around the lids, just at the root of the lashes. Then with the tip of a finger very gently rub that line up until only the very slightest suspicion of blue remains. The greatest care should always be taken never to let black lines around a woman's eyes. Before leaving the eyes let me say that if the brow has not by nature the delicate sweep of a swallow's wing, a tiny comb should be used, after the coloring has been applied, to comb them in as narrow and graceful a line as possible. These directions carefully followed, the eyes will be very much more brilliant, and the make-up cannot be detected under the most glaring light.

"To color the lips a different rouge must be used. Never use the same for both cheeks and lips. The best coloring for the lips is a good grease rouge which will not easily rub off. This should be applied on the inner edge of the lips and rubbed out. There should be just the slightest suspicion and no more. I consider a good lip rouge beneficial, as it prevents chapping, and in that way the use of this pencil be detected. There is nothing which looks worse in a 'make-up' than clearly defined blue or preserves the fine texture of the lips.

"Of course the make-up which I have described is for daylight and should be applied before an open window under the strongest light. The rouge for the face is a liquid. That of a strawberry red is the most natural except for deep brunettes or pink and white blondes. This make-up, which cannot be detected by daylight, needs only to be intensified for gaslight, but not for electric light. That is the hardest, most unbecoming light that could possibly fall on a painted woman's face. Unless she can make up to perfection she will use nothing after the application of soap and water when going under the glare of the electric light. They are clever women who at the horse show and other similar functions wear broad-brimmed hats to shield their faces from the glare of electricity.

"For gaslight 'make-ups' the slightest suspicion of color may be added on the upper eyelid, and on some faces a touch in the middle of the forehead just above the brow. This last touch is unbecoming to blondes as a rule, giving them what the French term a bourgeoise appearance; while for a daylight 'make-up' the addition of color over the eyes gives a dissipated appearance.

"I do not believe that women should make themselves up for all occasions, and a thinking woman will not. In my opinion a woman should never make up in the morning, that is, before noon. Those are the hours when the complexion is always at its best and the skin should be allowed to rest. Then she should on no account make-up while traveling. There are also some occasions ed by Spain up to about thirty years ago for carrying out the sentence of death.

Garrote wondered that a more expeditious and, therefore, merciful, method had not been discovered. He little thought then that he would be the one to furnish his country with a substitute for the gallows, but the thought haunted him so long that he at length found it assuming ordered form in his mind, and in time the ponderous death-dealing machine that immortalized him in his country came to be a fact.

The two points of excellence claimed for the garrote are these: That it can be made with reasonable care to kill instantly and that it sheds not one drop of blood. Force that is measured by horse power is the agency it employs and its aim is the breaking of the victim's neck.

The unfortunate is first made to sit in a chair directly under two heavy iron bars, one of which is adjusted on the back of his neck, and the other, vulgarly known as the corbatin, or necktie, under his chin. Then the executioner grasps the handle, gives a vigorous twist and death is instantaneous. The entire machine is made of iron and ordinarily weighs several hundred pounds.

Persons who have witnessed all sorts of capital punishment are unanimous in the opinion that garroting is the most revolting and appalling of all. It is not always as expeditious as its inventor made it possible to be. A vicious executioner can prolong it practically at will, and herein is the system's great drawback, as it is now constituted. Cases are citable in which the process was prolonged twenty, thirty minutes, even three-quarters of an hour! The executioner merely gave twist enough to the handle or lever to choke his victim. Then he turned it back and twisted again, a little more than at first, and so on until his spite, having been satisfied, or his instructions, perhaps, obeyed, he gave one final turn and ended the tortured life. Such was the execution of Maloja in Matanzas, Cuba, in 1888!

Titles of Books.

Publishers enjoy much satisfaction in correcting ludicrous mistakes made by the public and by critics in the titles of books. One would expect that in such a matter they would be free from similar errors. Yet we are asked to say that this week is published Mr. Robert Barr's new novel, "The Mutual Many." This is a title that should make the hair of Lindley Murray's head stand on end, if he had any. When Dickens produced "Our Mutual Friend," grave grammatical misgivings were entertained respecting the claims of these words to pass as good English, but even those who were inclined to give Boffin the benefit of the doubt could have no hesitation in discarding "The Mutual Many" as a monstrous horrendum and an outrage on syntax. Daring as Mr. Barr's English sometimes is, we are strongly inclined to believe that he is incapable of perpetrating such a grammatical felony, and that the title sent us is due solely to the ingenuity of the publisher, or his assistant. The real name of Mr. Barr's book is, unless we are greatly mistaken, "The Mutable Many," which is quite a different thing from the other, and is imprinted with Shakespearean authority.

PIG FOR THE FAMILY.

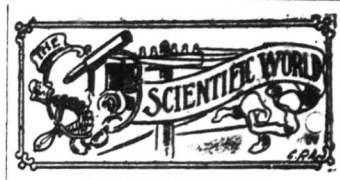
A. A. SOUTHWICK TELLS ABOUT THE BACON CROSS HE MADE.

Symmetrical and Blocky Animals That Furnish Both Fat and Lean Meat—A Chester White-Yorkshire Cross For Quick Growth.

After an acquaintance with the characteristics of most of the prominent breeds actual experience proves to me that a cross between the Chester White boar and Medium Yorkshire sow will produce animals of the highest quality and most desirable type in the majority of cases. Pigs of this cross, if from good animals individually, are wonderfully symmetrical and blocky, with broad backs and springing ribs, a property which indicates at once a good feeding quality. Nearly every pig will retain the lopped ear of the sire and if anything the fineness of bone is equal to that property which is so characteristic of the dam. This style of pig suggests when ready for market the choicest quality family pork.

I anticipated in this cross not only a marked improvement in the most valuable meat portions of the animal, but also a notable increase in weight, which is in itself a valuable desideratum, especially if the gain can be gotten without an extra outlay for feed. On Dec. 2 I dressed seven pure-bred medium Yorkshire pigs some nine months old, and seven of the cross breeds of the same age, the produce of an improved Chester boar and good, thrifty Medium Yorkshire sows. The feed and care in every particular had been alike in both cases. The seven Yorkshires weighed 2187 pounds, and the cross breeds 2472. The average length of these latter is from 12 to 18 inches more than the pure bloods. The average thickness of the back pork is from 1 1-2 to 2 inches more in the pure bloods than in the cross breeds, but the hams and belly pieces for bacon are much more profuse in lean meat in the latter with a less thickness of fat for a covering. One of the Yorkshires, weighing 282 pounds, had an average of five inches of solid pork the whole length of the back. As an illustration of the quickness of the growth of these cross breeds, a pair of pigs at Christmas were of the most desirable size for roasters, and these dressed the latter part of the following March 175 pounds each. They were fed upon the ordinary cooked swill in general use here.

In watching the growth and development of these animals I concluded that



GIRDLES THE EARTH.

Nicola Tesla Talks of His Latest Wonderful Discovery.

Nicola Tesla has just announced the completion of his latest discovery—the simultaneous transmission of messages by means of the earth's electrical currents to as many scattered points on the surface of the globe as may be desired. This he regards as by far his greatest achievement. He will follow his usual custom and lay his information before the world of science in his own works and accompanied by his own computations and conclusions. To a few intimates he gave a thrilling demonstration of the operation of his device for arresting and subjecting to control under natural laws the electrical substances in and about the earth. His latest invention, device or discovery is to produce such a disturbance of the electricity of the earth as can be felt and noted simultaneously at all parts of the globe.

Tesla had his rooms in the laboratory on Houston street, New York, darkened. From a room adjoining the one in which he and his visitors stood a current was turned on invisibly. A huge black disk hung on a frame about eight inches in diameter, from the centre of which protruded a brass electrode seven inches in diameter. As the group gazed at this the apartment was filled with a crackling sound, which increased till it sounded like the rattle of musketry. Bright flames shot from the electrode, not from pole to pole, as in ordinary demonstrations. Like fiery serpents the cells of flame darted in graceful lines around the disk. The longest sparks were fully eight feet from the point where they burst into dazzling brilliancy to the vanishing point. These electrical sparks were undoubtedly the longest flashes of light ever produced by similar means.

It seemed like a terrific lightning display, with the snapping, crackling sound, displacing the reverberation of heaven's artillery, and all remarked the weird and awing effect of the exhibition.

"What are you doing?" was asked Tesla.

"I am producing," said he, "an electrical disturbance of intense magnitude, which is continuing throughout the entire earth. In other words, I am pro-

THE FARMER'S BIRDS

WHY THE AGRICULTURIST SHOULD BE KIND TO THEM.

The Relations Between Them Should Be Friendly—Prof. Beal of Washington Discusses the Feathered Insect Eaters and Furnishes Much Information.

(Special Correspondence.)

Washington, Special.—Assistant Ornithologist Beal, of the United States biological survey, has prepared a bulletin for the Department of Agriculture about common birds and their relation to agriculture. It is a very interesting official document. Prof. Beal says:

"It has long been known that birds play an important part in relation to agriculture; but there seems to be a tendency to dwell on the harm they do, rather than on the good. Whether a bird is injurious or helpful depends almost entirely upon what it eats; and in the case of unusually abundant species of birds the character of the food becomes a very practical question."

Farmers of experience have long since concluded that the big flocks of blackbirds, woodpeckers and other common birds are not present to commit depredations, but to help the farmer by destroying noxious insects. Nearly all land birds subsist principally on insects, and during the breeding season they rear their young exclusively on this sort of food. When farmers discover an unusually large flock of birds they may well be assured that there is an unusually large crop of insects. They are luscious, and whoever believes that common birds are not epicures has not studied birds. They not only eat insects, but some of them are very choice of their selections. The common birds discover the presence of insects when human eyes would never even suspect their presence.

Attention is called by Prof. Beal to the fact that during the recent plague of locusts in the Western States they were eaten by every common bird in that section, and they formed the principal food of the birds during that entire season. Before the locusts came from the Rocky Mountains and descended upon the prairies the farmers complained of the unusual numbers of common birds. By prophetic instinct the birds knew that the locusts were coming, and they were there to receive them. The birds were, in some occult manner, advised of the immediate future, while the farmers were wholly unaware of the plague which was to come. Thus it appears that Providence is all-wise and all seeing; or as the old hymn hath it: "He moves in a mysterious way His wonders to perform."

Insectivorous birds feed upon that food which is most accessible and which is most palatable. Some birds pass by certain kinds of insects. They will not touch them, unless the birds are on short rations and ready to take any sort of food which will ward off the pangs of hunger. But the insects which are disdained by some birds are sought by other common birds as their chiefest dainties.

It is explained by the professor that ground-feeding birds will seek for insects in grass and dead leaves, or about the trunks of trees. Those insects are the most easily accessible; and the birds are like men, in that they are looking always for the easiest method of making a living. They will not fly as long as they can walk or waddle. No wise bird will make any effort to secure prey in the mountain tops when he can live like a prince in the valley. These common birds toil not, nor do they spin. They just take life as it comes, and live in clover if they can. They take no thought of the morrow, believing that sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof. The common birds are wise fellows.

The fly-catching birds have an easy time of it. They do not live in hotels, and order their meals sent to their rooms. On the contrary, they simply sit and wait for their opportunities. They know that there are lots of flies in the world; millions of them; and that flies constantly fly. They know that by sitting on their limbs, and patiently waiting the course of events, there will be enough flies every day coming their way

A GOOD TEXT

A well selected text is half of the sermon. Given a good text and a preacher who is in earnest, and the result is sure to be good. The text of this article is a plain simple statement that proves itself in the reader's own mind without argument. The text is "Good health is better than great riches."

Without health nothing really matters very much. A hacking cough takes all the beauty out of a landscape or a sunset. Erysipelas or eczema will spoil the enjoyment of sprightly conversation, of a beautiful concert, of a wonderful painting. The biggest bank account in the world won't pay a man for his health, but a very small amount of money will make him healthy and keep him healthy.

Most all bodily troubles start in the digestive or respiratory organs. It is here that improper living first makes an opening for disease. The development differs as constitutions and temperaments differ. The causes are almost identical. To get at the root of the matter is simple enough if you start right.

Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery is a medicine for the whole body. It works through the digestive organs on all the others.

It cures the first thing it comes to and after that, the next. It puts health in place of disease in the stomach, and from the vantage ground thus gained, it reaches every fiber of the body and drives disease before it — indigestion, liver troubles, kidney complaint, biliousness, skin and scalp diseases, salt-rheum, tetter, eczema, and all the troubles caused by impure blood.

sucking, in consuming so many insects."

The kingbird comes in for a word of praise. He is distinctly a fly catcher and takes a large portion of his food on the wing. The kingbird also watches the trees closely, and gathers in all sorts of insects. This bird has been suspected of catching honey bees; but an Iowa farmer says that he shot a dozen kingbirds near his hives, and found not a single bee in any one of their stomachs. Therefore he concludes that the kingbird is guiltless of this charge, modified by the fact that in various parts of the country 14 kingbirds were killed, and 40 drone bees were found in their stomachs. Isn't that wonderful? How in the realm of intelligence could those birds know that the drones were proper prey, while the working bees and queens must be spared?

The meadow lark is complimented because of the fact that it feeds almost wholly upon insects. In 238 stomachs examined, it was discovered that 73 per cent. of the food of the birds consisted of insects alone. It nests on the ground, and walks about with dainty step, knowing that it is a welcome visitor and therefore not in fear of human assault. The meadow lark is wholly beneficial, and is not guilty of the common charge of pulling sprouting grain. It loves fat bugs and beetles, and takes grasshoppers and caterpillars also, whenever they can be found. Even when the ground is covered with snow, this bird finds insects somehow, and does not seek the granaries. It is a very skillful insect catcher.

This letter contains only an epitome of the proofs presented in favor of the farmers' friend, the common bird.

ordinary cooked swill in general use here.

In watching the growth and development of these animals I concluded that with six weeks feeding in either case on a mixture of corn and oats ground, with say a quart of whole corn a day to each pig, that the same or perhaps greater weight, especially in the case of the cross breeds, might have been gotten at six months old or thereabouts. These two lots were not fed cornmeal or corn. I think the Chester Cross with a little extra feeding will easily make a hundred pounds to the pig more at the same age than the pure breeds and have a very much greater proportion of lean meat in the most valuable parts.—A. When Hogs Are Ripe.

Governor Rusk happened to drive over the State line once into Wisconsin looking at the farms. He was particularly struck with one farm, on which he found everything in first-class order, and riding up to the house inquired the name of the owner, when a tall German came out and gave his name as Theodore Louis (who has lectured in Canada), says a writer in The Atlanta Constitution.

"What do you regard as the greatest wealth-producting agency in agriculture?" the Governor asked him.

"The hog," was the sententious reply.

"Upon what do you base this statement?"

"He lifts more mortgages than anything else."

The conversation which ensued developed the fact that Louis had once been what is called an all-wheat farmer and kept constantly sinking into debt. He decided that something had to be done quickly or there would be very little left for Louis, so he decided to try the hog. The first year he made a little money, the second he made more, and then he became thoroughly interested. The result was that he became recognized as a great authority on hogs. His neighbors took up his example and mortgages began to be lifted, until finally there was not one on record against that community.

"How long would you keep a hog?" asked Governor Rusk.

"I would not keep him—I would kill him."

"When?"

"When he is ripe."

"When is he ripe?"

"When he is fat."

"Wouldn't it pay to keep the hog for two or three years?"

"I tried that once," said Louis. "I took a hog in the fall and weighed him, and I took my corn and weighed it. When spring came the corn was all gone, and the hog weighed about what he did in the fall. That made me say next year that I would kill my hogs in the fall and save my corn."

"How much does it cost to keep a hog through the winter?"

"Three dollars."

"How many hogs winter in Minnesota?"

"One million. I have just looked at the auditor's report."

"Do you mean to say that we lose $3,000,000 a year in wintering hogs?"

"Yes, that's what you do. If you kill them all in the fall you will have left in your cribs $3,000,000 worth of corn to sell."

Diseased plants should never be added to the manure heap, as they contaminate the whole mass. It is possible to spread plant diseases over the entire farm through the agency of manure, and no farm will get rid of any disease that attacks plants until all refuse is burnt.

There are thousands of sickly school-girls all over this broad land that are dragging their way through school-life who might enjoy that abundant life which belongs to youth by simple attention to hygienic laws and a proper course of treatment with Scott's Emulsion. This would make the blood rich, the heart-beat strong; check that tendency to exhaustion and quicken the appetite by strengthening the digestion. Our book tells more about it. Sent free.

I am producing," said he, "an electrical disturbance of intense magnitude, which is continuing throughout the entire earth. In other words, I am producing a disturbance of the earth's charge of electricity which can be felt to the uttermost parts of the earth."

"And the result will be?"

"Ah," said Tesla, "that is almost incomprehensible. This electral disturbance by means of certain simple instruments can be felt and appreciated at any point of the globe. In this way messages can be sent the entire earth around and be taken up at any part of the earth without the aid of intervention of wires in any way at all."

A New Electric Lamp.

It is prophesied that present methods of illumination are to be superseded by a lamp nearly perfected by Puluj, of Vienna, one of the earlier experimenters on cathode rays. For fifteen years he has been working upon it. Not only does it generate Roentgen rays, but it also transforms nearly all the energy of the electric current into light. Prof. Elbert's experiments prove that a single horse power of electric energy would be sufficient to operate 46,000 Puluj lamps. Prof. Lodge, head of the department of experimental physics in Universal College, Liverpool, says that "if mechanical energy can be converted entirely into light alone one man turning the crank of a suitable machine could generate enough light for a whole city." Puluj claims that his lamp fulfills this condition. Our present electric lighting system only utilizes from one to three per cent. of its energy in light, the rest passes off in heat. Puluj's lamp is lighted by means of an induction coil or a glass plate electric machine. The static electricity is the same as lightning. Puluj is investigating "the development of ethereal light vibration by chemical means."

Died With His Secret.

With the recent death at Naugatuck of Herbert B. Fowler, there has been lost the secret of an invention that promised to be of great value to the commercial world. It was a process for making an electrical deposit of copper from a solution upon wood or any other rigid or semi-rigid substance. This process was made possible by coating the substance that was to be copper-plated with a liquid preparation, the secret of which was known only to Mr. Fowler. Every means had been used to induce him to patent the invention, but he declined, fearing he might lose the use of it.

A Chicago company was recently formed which offered to take up manufacturing with the copper deposit extensively, but conditioned their offer upon the patenting of the invention. Their proposition was sent to Mr. Fowler, but before an agreement had been reached the inventor died.

Scientific Insect Destruction.

A noted bacteriologist has lately conceived a plan of exterminating all bothersome insects by inoculating them with some disease peculiarly fatal to their respective species. The plan was suggested by the successful results obtained by experiments in ridding fields of grain from chinch bugs. Mosquitoes, which are believed to convey malaria from the swamps to the human system, would exist no more. Flies, which are not as good scavengers as was once supposed and for whose loss improved sanitary measures would more than compensate, would no longer amble over the heads and noses of would-be nappers. There is a pathogenic germ which could be cultivated in tubes, as consumption bacilli are now propagated, which would sweep millions of the latter from existence. Bugs, gnats and all insects which ruin grain and fruit are to be the subject of bacteriological experiment.

Wounded Plants Have Fever.

H. M. Richards, in England, has discovered in wounded plants a phenomenon corresponding to fever in animals. It runs, as does increase in respiration, a definite course, and attains its maximum in about 24 hours after injury. He says that, compared with the ordinary temperature of plants in relation to the surrounding medium, the rise after the injury is "as great as, if not greater than, in animals." In massive tissues, such as potatoes and radishes afford, the effect of the injury was local, whereas in leaves (e.g., onion bulbs) much greater extent of tissue was sympathetically affected.

Drunk and Sober.

A statistician has compiled a curious table of the expectancy of life, drunk and sober. At the age of 20, drunk 15 years, sober 44 years; at the age of 40, drunk 11, sober 29 years.

constantly fly. They know that by sitting on their limbs, and patiently waiting the course of events, there will be enough flies every day coming their way to meet the requirements of their appetites. They simply open their little bills, give a peck at the passing fly and swallow him. If it is a common fly, well and good. If it is a fat horse fly, so much the better. The birds know their business. After reading the professor's story about birds the writer is convinced that there are plenty of men who have much less sense, and who might well study the common birds and their methods of getting on in the world.

In the scientific study of common birds there has been many a murder committed. Field observation is not sufficient for man, because he cannot discern the details of the workings of the birds. In order to obtain accurate and reliable information, man loads his shot gun, goes out into the field and shoots down a number of these innocent cannibals. For what purpose? Simply to take each dead bird and examine his stomach. The scientist can then learn what food the birds subsist upon, and hence can determine whether or not they are friends or foes of the husbandman. It is generally discovered that the common birds are the friends of the farmers, and are destroying his insectivorous enemies. This discovery having been made in each case, the farmers are informed of the result of the investigation, and thereafter the shotgun is dispensed with. So the killing of a few birds results in saving the lives of thousands of others.

THE BLUEBIRD.

The professor says that cuckoos are much given to eating caterpillars, and do not object to their hair, as many birds do. On the contrary cuckoos eat so many hairy caterpillars that the hairs pierce the inner linings of their stomachs; and when they are opened and turned inside out, the cuckoo stomachs seem to be lined with a thin coating of fur, which appears to be a part of the stomach itself. Nature provides for continued digestion, just the same.

While the scientific slaughter of cuckoos was going on, 16 of the birds were examined, and the result shows that they had all been diligently engaged in helping the farmers of their neighborhood. The 16 stomachs showed the remains of 328 caterpillars, 11 beetles, 15 grasshoppers, 63 saw flies, four spiders, and three stink bugs. Those were industrious birds, and they were doing their best for their farmer friends, when they were ruthlessly shot down for scientific investigation. Just think of it! There were 328 caterpillars, many of them in the larva stage. But for those cuckoos all of those caterpillars would have been working on the leaves of trees; and they prefer apple trees. Of the 63 saw flies, 60 were in the larva stage.

Investigation demonstrates that farmers should do their best to cultivate woodpeckers. They leave no marks on healthy trees. On the contrary they unerringly trail down the wood-boring larvae, and dislodge and devour them. It is a picnic for a woodpecker to catch these tree killers. They eat them with as much satisfaction and gratification as a summer girl manifests over a dish of ice cream. It usually happens that after these wood-boring larvae are destroyed, the holes are filled with colonies of ants. Do the woodpeckers leave them to thrive there? Not much, they like ants pretty well, too; and they watch those holes carefully, well knowing that they will have an epicurean festival of ants after a little while; and consequently they keep the trees clean all the time. It is their business and pleasure to do so. Two flicker woodpeckers' stomachs were examined in the laboratory, and they each contained 3000 ants, besides the wood-boring larva. Those were good woodpeckers, and ought to have been kept and cultivated by the farmers' firesides as near neighbors and close friends.

The official bulletin has a good word also for the red-headed woodpecker. It is admitted that this bird is guilty of tapping trees and drinking the sap. It has been discovered, however, that very few trees are seriously injured; although some have died within a year or two after being sapped by these red-headed fellows. The professor says, however, that "the bird captures millions of insects which are attracted by the sweet sap, and the tree tapping is largely for the purpose of catching insects. It is probable that the red-head fully com-

"It's perfectly disgraceful!" she exclaimed.

"What's the matter?" inquired her husband.

"Here's a description of a woman who gets up in public and declares herself an anarchist."

An Unsympathetic Mood.

"Is it not sweet and inspiring," she said, "to stand on the shore where the waves sing eternally and gaze into the offing?"

"Well," replied the young man who lacks sentiment, "I suppose that is enjoyable if you know how to appreciate it. But the last time I went to the seashore I didn't give much thought to the offing. What I wanted was an awning."

Practical.

"What nonsense it is," remarked the sentimental girl, "to take daisies and by plucking off the petals try to learn whether or not a man loves you."

"Yes," replied Miss Cayenne; "it is very silly. A much better method is to take the roses he sends you around to the florist's and find out how much they cost."—Washington Star.

Twenty-five Years in Orders.

On Wednesday, Sept. 22nd, the Rev. Arthur Jarvis celebrates the twenty-fifth anniversary of his ordination. It is proposed to hold a service appropriate to the occasion in the church at 7.30 p.m. This will be conducted by the Very Reverend the Dean of Ontario, other clergy being present and assisting. After the services an old fashioned reunion and reception will be given in the school room by Mr. and Mrs. Jarvis, to which the members of the congregation and their friends are invited. No personal invitations will be given. His Honor Judge Wilkison will take the chair.

A New Departure.

Mr. J. S. Hulett, Napanee's enterprising photographer, whose exhibits at the Lennox Fair is now looked upon as one of the most interesting features of the show, is putting out special efforts this year to have one of the finest displays of photographic work ever exhibited in this section of the country. It is Mr. Hulett's intention to exhibit a new class of work, never before shown in this section. As the time for holding the fair draws nigh, speculation is rife as to who will crrry off the handsome prize awarded by Mr. Hulett to the handsomest girl baby. In thus encouraging the raising of pretty babies, J. S. is doing a good work and we trust his enterprise will be suitably rewarded.

Decidedly Cool.

A Napanee citizen had a unique experience while returning from the Toronto Industrial last week. When he boarded the train at the Union Station he carried a basket of luscious peaches in his hand. He set the basket on the seat beside him, placed his hat on it and settled back in his seat. At one of the stations enroute to Napanee a man boarded the train, removed the hat off the basket and walked off with the peaches. The owner of the fruit was so thunder-struck with astonishment at the coolness of the proceeding that it never dawned on him to enter a protest until the train had moved out. The citizen is congratulating himself that the man didn't appropriate his hat also.

HAIL TO THE CHIEF.

WHO WILL BE THE LUCKY MAN. TWENTY-SEVEN APPLICATIONS. A PASSING BREEZE.

An adjourned meeting of the town council was held at the council chamber on Monday evening last, Mayor Ward presiding.

The following members of the council were present: Leonard, Alexander, Boyle, Dey, Ming, Carson, Miller, Perry, Aylsworth and Madole.

A petition signed by D. A. Vallean and fifteen others praying for a new walk on Centre St., near the G. T. R. Station, was read and referred to the Street Committee to report.

The petitions of Messrs. T. E. Anderson, and D. S. Warner, and of Dr. Cowan and Mrs. M. J. Warner for a permanent walk in front of their residences, they to bear half the cost of construction, was granted.

Jeremiah Storms tendered his resignation as Chief-of-Police, to take effect on the appointment of a successor.

The resignation was accepted and the council settled down to a consideration of the applications for the position received in response to the advertisement in the Toronto papers for a new Chief-of-Police.

There was quite crowd present during the reading of the applications and much interest was evinced in the proceedings.

W. H. York, Tamworth, wanted a married man's salary. The council will likely refer this application to Mr. T. G. Davis.

R. S. Milligan, Napanee, tendered for $500 per year.

H. B. Garland, of Toronto Junction, thirty-seven years of age, wanted the position but didn't state salary.

Arch. McFadyen, of Huntsville, who has had three years experience on the Winnipeg force, is thirty-four years of age, goes six feet and an inch better, and weighs 200 lbs. He was modest in his demands—$800 per year.

Bernard J. McDermott, Renfrew, also in the six foot class, would be satisfied with $700.

Jas. Nesbitt, of Clarke, Durham Co., is after the position, but didn't state salary.

E. H. Sills, High County Constable, would accept $500 per year. "Ed." enclosed a letter from Detective Rogers.

Jno. Teasdale, of Concord, is evidently something of a politician as he is personally acquainted with N. Clarke Wallace and other shining lights in the political firmament. He didn't state salary.

CONSERVATIVE DEMONSTRATION.

MR. WHITNEY AND HIS LIEUTENANTS AT NAPANEE. A LARGE CROWD GATHERS TO HEAR THEM.

The Conservatives of Lennox extended a welcome to Mr. J. P. Whitney, M.P., leader of the Ontario Opposition, and his two lieutenants, Dr. Willoughby, M.P., and Mr. Ed. Cochrane, M.P., of East Northumberland, at Napanee, on Thursday.

Mr. Whitney and his Lieutenants arrived on the noon train and were met at the station by the following reception committee:—Messrs. R. A. Fowler, president of the Lennox Liberal Conservatives, U. Wilson, M.P., J. W. Bell, M.P., Jas. Reid, M.P.P., Dr. Meacham, M.P.P., J. C. Carscallen, Jessie Amey, T. V. Sexsmith, J. F. Chalmers, Allan Oliver, A. Downey, E. Davey, L. L. Gallagher, T. G. Davis, J. R. Fraser, T. D. Pruyn, E. S. Lapum, U. M. Wilson, Donald McLiver, W. D. Madden, and W. G. Wilson, chairman. Rigs were in waiting and headed by the Citizens' Band the procession proceeded to the hotels.

The afternoon meeting was held in the Napanee Curling Rink, which was beautifully decorated for the occasion. The decorative committee are deserving of high praise for the artistic manner in which the rink was laid out. Beautiful flowers adorned the speakers platform, and tasty mottos and pictures embellished the walls. The rink was festooned with bunting of harmonious colors and political mottos met the gaze on every hand. The meeting was not very largely attended and was undemonstrative throughout. The Citizens' Band was present and discoursed several fine selections of music. The following gentlemen occupied seats on the platform: Rev. McDonald, Jas. Reid, M. P. P., Dr. Smythe, Kingston, Mr. Fortiscue, Mr. E. Davy, Dr. Willoughby, E. Cochrane, M. P., East Northumberland, Uriah Wilson, M. P., R. A. Fowler, Amherst Island, W. D. Madden, T. G. Carscallen, W. G. Wilson, U. M. Wilson, J. C. Carscallen, T. G. Davis, J. W. Bell. Jesse Amey, T. V. Sexsmith, J. F. Chalmers, Allen Oliver, L. L. Gallagher, J. T. Grange, T. D. Pruyn.

The following were present from Kingston: Dr. Smythe, John McIntyre, J. Morgan Shaw, D. Walkem, Chas. R. Webster, Geo. Richardson, from Macdonald Club, Mayor Skinner, Dr. Herald, Dr. Ryan, T. J. Shanks, E. W. Sullivan, John Donnolly, jr.

A good sprinkling of the fair sex graced the meeting with their presence.

When the chairman called the meeting to order Ida Kathleen, the pretty daughter of Dr. Cowan, came forward and presented Mr. Whitney with a bonquet of flowers. Retta Craig, another pretty miss, presented Dr. Meacham with a similar token of regard.

R. A. Fowler, president of the Lennox Lib-Con. Association, in opening the meeting considered it a privilege to occupy the chair. He felt very warm towards the Conservative party at present. Early in life he had enlisted under the banner of Sir John A. Macdonald and had never regretted it. He considered the Conservative party the party of progress and loyalty. As time was precious he would proceed at once to call upon the first speaker, our old friend and representative, Dr. Meacham.

Dr. Meacham said it afforded him a great deal of pleasure to be present to-day. There were a few little drawbacks. One was the fact that the Addington show was being held to day which no doubt kept a great many away. They had expected Mr. Miscampbell, but he was absent through illness.

Mr. St, John had promised to be present and they expected him for the evening meeting. Mr. Hardy had said it was his government or nothing, as the Conservatives had no men who were able to conduct the affairs of the Province. They would hear two of the leaders of the Opposition to day and could form their own conclusions. Dr. Meacham here took up the new License Act and strongly condemned it. Dealing with the finances of the Province, Dr. Meacham said that during John Sanfield Macdonald's regime he saved $900,000 per year and endeavored to show by specious reasoning that the present government were running in debt and had no surplus.

Mr. Uriah Wilson, M.P. was quite sure that they hadn't come to hear him and that he didn't come to make a speech. If Mr. Whitney, if elected, is as wreckless in the fulfilment of his promises as the Dominion Government he could count on his opposition when he came up for re-election. Mr. Wilson declared he was

Of the 27 applicants who applied for the position of chief of police only two are now in the running, it is said. The choice lies between W. H. Babbitt, and Wm. Rankin, of Port Hope. Rankin was here on Wednesday and Babbitt has been in town for the past week or so.

Duck Lyn caused considerable amusement in court on Friday last. The Magistrate in imposing sentence upon her said among other things: "I am disposed to deal leniently with you and will sentence you to the common gaol for ninety days." Duck turned to her father, and with tears in her eyes enquired: "Oh, Lord! isn't that a year? What is it?"

Murney Parks' barn at Hawley was burned to the ground last week by a spark from a steam thresher which was at work on his place. Four hundred bushels of grain, 12 tons of hay, a wagon, harness, and some implements were consumed. A separator and horse belonging to Mr. Miller were burned. There was $250 insurance on the barn and $150 on the contents.

Dan McCarthy and his excellent company will appear at the Brisco Opera House, Napanee, on Monday and Tuesday, 20th, and 21st. The play presented will be one of Mr. McCarthy's latest successes "The Cruiskeen Lawn," an Irish Comedy Drama, that has been a big hit wherever presented. The play is bright and has a strong vein of comedy running through it. Mr. McCarthy in the character of Paddy Miles, stands out clear and distinct, but not with such brilliancy as to throw the other characters in the back ground. The specialties introduced are good and the comedy work in the first and second acts is said to be very laughable. We have no doubt that the Brisco Opera House will be crowded to see this excellent performance. Tickets, 25, 35 and 50 cents.

Obituary.

Marshall Bidwell Wagar, who died in Richmond, at the residence of Thomas Anderson Jr., on September, 3rd, had been a great sufferer from cancer, for the past two years. Deceased was in his sixty-first year and was a resident of Camden township until recently, when he went to reside with his daughter, Mrs. Anderson. He bore an excellent character and was highly respected by his many friends. The funeral which was the largest ever held in this community, was conducted by J. Spencer Ellis, of Toronto. The remains were taken to the Western Cemetery, Napanee, and placed in the vault. A widow, four daughters, and one son, are left to mourn the loss of a noble husband and kind father, and have the symyathy of many friends in their bereavement.

Largely Attended.

The entertainment under the auspices of the Sons of Temperance, in Brisco's Opera House on Monday evening was a highly successful affair. The Society had spared no effort and as a result the attendance was very large, over 1,000 people being present. Mr. D. Nesbitt, of Newburgh, made an efficient chairman. The programme consisted of vocal and instrumental music by Mrs. F. E. Vanluven, F. L. Tooker and D. P. Henwood, interspersed with addresses by W. W. Meacham, M.P.P., B. E. Aylsworth, Warden of the County, A. D. Weeks, Grand Treasurer of the Order, and J. M. Walton, Grand Worthy Patriarch. The following gentlemen countenanced the movement by their presence on the platform: W. Wilson, M.P., Thos. Jamieson, W. H. Bruton, Geo. Rolliston, Rev. Cruickshanks, Rev. Caleb Parker, and Rev. Dr. Crothers.

Committed to Gaol.

The trial of Agnes Lyn, (Duck) Hattie Smith, Ida May Storms, and Mary Carr, took place before Police Magistrate Daly at the town hall on Friday last. Duck Lyn was found guilty of being the keeper of a disorderly house and will spend 90 days in gaol. Hattie Smith and Ida May Storms, for being frequenters of the same, and using obscene language on the street, were each sentenced to 60 days in gaol. Mary Carr, a 13-year old frequenter, whose mother is unable to control her, was sent to the Mercer Reformatory for two years. Mary can neither read nor write; on her return she may be able to do both. W. Sills, and Jas. Rogers two Deseronto youths, who were found in the house with Mary Carr when it was raided by Mr. Wesley Huff, gave evidence and the Magistrate remanded them until yesterday. Jas. Losee, another Deseronto boy, who failed to appear for trial, was arrested at his home in Deseronto on Monday and brought to Napanee.

A meeting of the Board of Education was held at the council chambers on Tuesday, all the members present except Mr. Alex Henry, H. M. Deroche, Q.C., presiding.

On motion the matter of the Kindergarten, in reference to the use of the school room, and the question of fuel, etc., was referred to the Committee on Teachers to investigate and report.

The question of appointing a teacher to succeed Mr. Lang, as teacher of Moderns in the Collegiate Institute was next taken up. Dr. Cowan who visited the Education Department, reported as to the qualifications of the applicants.

On motion Mr. Jno. F. Veneyery, Peterboro, was engaged temporarily until the Xmas vacation at the rate of $700 per year.

On motion J. R. Street, Clark University, Massachusetts was engaged as teacher of Moderns at a salary of $1,000 per year, services to commence on the 1st of Jan. 1898.

Mr. Street was unable to enter upon the duties at present.

The Property Committee was instructed to procure a clock for West Ward School.

ment. He didn't state salary.

A telegram was read from a friend of Ex-Chief Rankin, of Cobourg, stating that Rankin was out of town, but would wire the council on his return.

H. Good, of Queenston, J. R. Chisman, Toronto Junction, and Jos. Walker, a car builder, whose time was so taken up that he could hardly spare time to write, all sent in applications.

S. E. Perry, Napanee, put in a verbal application, at $475 per annum.

On motion of Madole and Dey a committee composed of the Mayor, Reeve Leonard, Coun, Aylsworth was appointed to confer with the Police Committee and consider the applications and references and report at a special meeting of the council on Wednesday night next.

A few minor matters were disposed of.

The council decided to grant Ben Johnston, who is ill with fever in the Kingston hospital, $3 per week for the services of his horse and cart, which is being used upon the streets.

Quite a little breeze arose over the question of building a permanent walk around Mr. Dennis Daly's residence. Mr. Daly offered to pay two thirds the cost of constructing the walk if it was built 4½ feet wide on Dundas street and 4 feet wide on the side streets. The council at a previous meeting decided that 4 feet was wide enough and as this was tantamount to a rejection of Mr. Daly's proposition a motion to re-consider was moved.

Coun. S. R. Miller rose to enquire the the width of the walk on Bridge St. in in front of Messrs. Dafoe and F. W. Smith's residences. He was informed that it was 4½ feet wide.

At the regular meeting a motion was passed that the walk should be only 4 feet wide and Coun. Miller wanted to know why the chairman of the Street Committee had exceeded his instructions.

Mr. Miller referred to the uselessness of the council passing motions if the members would not abide by them.

Reeve Leonard explained that he had intended to build the walk 4 feet wide as instructed but that Messrs. Smith and Dafoe would not hear to it, stating that if the council wouldn't pay the $1.50 involved in making the walk six inches wider they would. On this assurance he had built the walk 4 feet 6 inches wide.

This didn't satisfy Coun. Miller and Deputy-Reeve Madole sprang to the defence of the chairman of streets. He didn't like these taunts, as they were unfair to the chairman of the Street Committee who was one of the most conscientious men on the board. Mr. Madole made a reference to Coun. Miller's conduct being ungentlemanly.

Coun. Miller retorted that his conduct was just as gentlemanly as Mr. Madole's, and that wasn't saying a great deal.

Reeve Leonard said that the taunts referred to didn't annoy him in the least. It was simply a case of harass and it was unnecessary for Mr. Madole to come to his defence. He asked that Mr. Smith be heard in reference to the matter.

Mr. F. W. Smith said that when a walk along East Street was first promulgated he favored a four foot walk. However a four and a half foot walk had been put down and when it was decided to build a walk on Bridge Street, a thoroughfare, he went for a 4½ foot walk and would consent to nothing else. He had assured Reeve Leonard that if the council would not pay their share of the extra six inches he would. If the walk had been built four feet wide and joining a four foot and a half walk on East Street it would have been a miserable job. This was a permanent walk they were putting down, and when he gave town $33 to assist in putting a permanent walk down at a cost of 1¼ cents a square foot more than they could put a board walk down for, his wishes should be consulted. When councillors demurred about a paltry dollar or so on the cost of a permanent walk they were not conserving the interest of the ratepayers.

After a good deal of discussion, pro and con, the proposition to build the Daly walk 4½ feet wide was defeated.

Other minor matters were disposed of and council adjourned.

election. Mr. Wilson declared he was opposed to bonuses. In closing his address Mr. Wilson said there was one motto on the walls which appealed to him, viz, "A British Subject I was born and a British Subject I will die."

Dr Willioughby said he was pleased to be present as his face indicated. People had to discuss and look at public questions. We had a government in power who looked upon the people as their servants and treated them as such. He wanted them to consider the question free of bias. He was a strong party man; he was so from conviction. All the years they were in opposition the Conservatives had been acting in the interests of the people. The present government came into power under rosy circumstances. They came in with four millions of a surplus, and had spent this and twenty eight millions in addition received from sale of timber limits. The Government have no surplus to day and never had one of their own making. On the contrary the Province was in debt. The opposition had been urging the Government to spare the trees. A wrong had been done the Province by allowing Americans to come over and remove our timber. The speaker then turned his attention to Premier Hardy. During his short term he he had weakened the government and he was satisfied Hardy couldn't carry Ontario. Dr. Willioughby also attacked Mr. Tarte. Tarte had a peculiar penchant for bribery and not being able to exercise it in the Conservative ranks had joined the Grits. Mr. Hardy had given Mr. Tarte a character. What was Mr. Hardy's character? He was called the wicked partner of the combination. Mr. Mowat was the christian politician. Hardy engineered the crooked transactions in the past. The speaker then read a clipping from a French radical paper which said Tarte should be consigned to the devil. They didn't want the help of the Dominion Conservatives as they didn't need them. The speaker then turned his attention to Mr. G. W. Ross. He was a clever man but no greater autocrat ever came into the Province of Ontario. It was a public calamity that Mr. Ross had been made Minister of Education. In that position Mr. Ross had crushed all individuality out of all the school teachers of Ontario. They had to be subservient to him if they hoped for preferment. There was an incipiant battle among the teachers of Ontario and all would be pleased to see Ross go. The speaker here modified his attack by saying he was proud of the school system of Ontario. Referring to the examinations, which are held in Toronto, he said the examinations were conducted with dilatoriness. The Board of Examiners were generally friends of the government. The system of examination in Ontario is nothing but a hot bed. The pupils get culture. The Agricultural College is very expensive and if he were to judge by its usefulness he would say it ought to be wiped out. The experimental farm had been run at a loss. Mr. Dryden was an incompetent minister. "The other departments didn't amount to much," said the speaker. Referring to the Public Accounts Committee he said the Patrons had joined hands with the government from the start.

Mr W. D. Madden, on behalf of the association, read an address to Mr. Whitney. The address was signed by the following gentlemen: R. A. Fowler, U. M. Wilson, W. G. Wilson, chairman of the Demonstration Committee.

Mr. Whitney, on rising was greeted with cheers. He thanked them for the address. He would deal with the political features contained therein in his address. He paid a tribute to Dr. Meacham and Uriah Wilson. He thanked them for the magnificent demonstration and said it was an indication of the way the people were worked up against the mal-administration of the government. Mr. Whitney turned his attention to the mining lands of Ontario. He here discussed the Engledue syndicate and condemned the government for what he termed this outrageous act. The syndicate paid $20,000 for the mining land in question for the privelege of prospecting it. The first year they were called upon to expend $30,000 in development, $40,000 the second, $50,000 the third, but this was no hardship as the syndicate had to spend money to make the land of any value to them. Granting the Engeldue Co. this land was nothing more than a steal. The speaker entered into a comparison of the legislation involved on the Dominion and Provincial Governments. The Provincial Government legislated on property. He announced himself as a follower of Sir John A. Macdonald, and paid a high tribute to the dead statesman. Sir John, he said, died at the close of his great and successful struggle fought against domestic traitors and foreign enemies. Mr. Whitney after disavowing any connection with Tupper, entered into a consideration of the finances of the Province and predicted the rapid approach of direct taxation. Mr. Whitney said responsible Government was only secured by political parties—it can't be got by one party and is impossible with three or four. Mr. Whitney said the Government had no surplus. The government claimed a surplus of assets over liabilities presently payable of four millions and seven hundred thousand dollars. The speaker criticized the educational policy of the Government. He was a defender of the High School system, but it was not today what it was. It is to-day simply a gigantic mould out of which is pressed candidates for school teachers. It had been deflected from its original purposes. In the public schools of Ontario ninety-five per cent of our children get all the education they will ever receive. A larger amount of education should be obtained in those schools. A council should be formed upon which all the teachers and professors in the province should find a place. The license question was then taken up. The administration of the license law had been dragged in the mire by that man who had dared to call himself a christian politician. Hotel keepers were squeezed by the Ontario Government. The question of prohibition was somewhere in the air like Andre's ballon. Some had said there was to be a plebiscite. He didn't know. Mr. Whitney condemned the New License Law. On Temperance question Mr. Whitney was in Torres Vedras. He asked them to believe the Government guilty of the mal-administration of which they had accused them and take himself and party on trust.

The meeting closed with cheers for the Queen and Mr. Whitney.

The Dominion Bank Robbery.

The detectives engaged on the Dominion Bank robbery are now believed to be on the track of the burglars. During July and August four men, with no ostensable means of support, were camped upon Hawley's Point, on the Napanee river, about a mile from town. They kept to themselves and their presence was a subject of comment to the residents of that neighborhood. About dark every evening they would leave the point and proceed in the direction of Napanee. Weeks before the robbery, conjecture was rife as to the character of the men. A few weeks previous to the cracking of the Dominion Bank the residence of Mr. F. W. Morris was entered and money, plate, and jewellery carried off. A few days after this incident a county constable visited the head quarters of the much talked of quartette and gathered in two of the gang, the other members not being in sight. They were brought before Police Magistrate Daly and being unable to satisfy him as to their ability to maintain themselves honestly while remaining in idleness he gave them one hour in which to leave town. One of the pair had in his possession several bundles of coppers done up in paper after the fashion employed in banks. A few days after the tramps had been before the magistrate the Dominion Bank was entered and robbed of $32,000. It is now believed that the four men in question are the artists who performed the work. It is said that they gained an entrance through the partition at the rear of the building over two months ago. They acquainted themselves with the movements of the clerks and each evening entered the bank and worked on the combination. The locks on the vault were soon mastered, the first night affording ample time it is alleged, the burglars then applied themselves to the more difficult task of working out the combination of the safe. Just here the connection between the bundles of coppers found upon the member of the suspected gang when arrested previous to the robbery is established. It is the custom of the bank to do the coppers up in parcels, and at stated intervals they are summed up. The coppers are kept in the vault and no particular attention is paid to them. When the robbers gained access to the vault they took several packages of coppers to satisfy their wants, and the loss was not noticed. It is believed that the burglars were fully six weeks working out the combination on the safe. The apparent leader of the gang was over six feet in height. He had iron grey hair, clear cut features and was apparently about 40 years of age. He wore a cheap navy blue suit and a black fedora hat. In the raid upon the bank the robbers carried off $32,000, including $10,000 in unsigned $10 notes and $2,125 in gold. A few days ago one of these unsigned notes turned up in the Montreal branch of the Bank of Commerce, and the cashier at once notified Provincial Detective Greer, who has the case in hand. That officer immediately went to Montreal, and is now busy trying to trace the note, with good hopes of it leading him to a solution of the mystery. Prior to the discovery of this bill the authorities had no exact knowledge of the numbers of the notes, but now they hope to be able figure out this important detail, and if successful their prospects of ultimate success will be considerably brightened. The detectives are at a loss to know how this information became public property.

Jas. McCallum is now acting as night-watchman at the Dominion Bank. We understand that watchmen have been put on in all branch banks throughout the province since the robbery.

Detective Wilks, the Pinkerton man, is devoting his time to Napanee and vicinity.

The combination of the vault was supposed to have been known only to W. H. Green, the junior clerk, and W. H. Ponton, the cashier, while the secret of the combination on the safe holding the money rested with manager Baines and Mr. Durand, the ledger-keeper. The latter was off on his holidays, being up in Eglington when the robbery occurred, and heard of the affair first through the newspapers.

THE LOVE LIGHTS OF HOME.

The bird to the nest and the bee to the comb,
When the night from the heavens falls dreary,
And Love to the light in the windows of home—
The light of the love of my dearie.
And Love to the light like a swallow in flight,
When the storm blows the stars from the blue of the night;
And a kiss from the red rose, a smile from the white,
In the gardens that bloom for my dearie!

The ships in the harbor from over the foam,
When the way has been stormy and weary,
And Love to the light in the windows at home—
The light of the love of my dearie.
And Love to the light, like the bloom from the blight
When the spring sun weaves wonders of red and of white,
And the darkness of winter is kissed to the bright
In the gardens that bloom for my dearie.

The birds to the nest and the bee to the comb,
And never a night shall fall dreary
While the lights in the beautiful windows at home
Are lit by the love of my dearie!
And Love to the light, like a bird from the night,
Where angels in lilies Love's litanies write,
And a kiss from the crimson, a smile from the white,
In the gardens that bloom for my dearie!

ANOTHER CRITICISM—THE CONSERVATIVE LEADERS JUDGED FROM A FARMER'S STAND POINT.

DEAR EXPRESS—As you have already printed one letter of mine, criticising the Conservative Leader's late speeches here in Napanee, from a farmer's standpoint, perhaps you will allow space for some futher remarks on the same line.

Those who heard their speeches and even those who have read the reports published, must have noticed that every speaker, without exception, referred to the fact that the Sandfield Macdonald Government left in the public treasury a surplus of over four millions, in hard cash—that he kept the annual expenditure much within the annual receipts, and they led their hearers to infer that had not the Liberals come into power the same system of annual surpluses would have gone on until to-day.

SOME UNFAIR COMPARISONS.

Dr. Meacham took a good deal of pains to prepare and read a comparative statement of the yearly average total receipts and total expenditures of each parliament since Confederation. According to his showing there was an average surplus of nearly a million a year during the Macdonald regime and then the average expenditure jumped from about a million and a half each year to over three millions during the first parliament under Liberal rule and it had remained about there ever since. No doubt that will be one of the Doctor's favorite lines of attack during the next campaign in Lennox county.

His figures may be correct but the inferences he attempts to draw are anything but that. A PART of the truth is carefully presented but not the WHOLE truth. These figures, when properly explained and understood, give no such evidence of "reckless extravagance" and of "squandering the peoples' money" as some pretend for. Let all the facts of the case be clearly understood and the case is by no means such a bad one as all the Conservative orators tried so hard to make out.

What are the facts? Simply these: Sandfield Macdonald had no idea himself of continuing to hoard up any such annual surpluses, or of keeping the yearly public expenditure down to the point that it was during the first four years of our independent provincial existence. He was fortunate in having about the same annual per capita bounty from the Dominion Government we have had ever since. His other sources of provincial revenue average almost as large as they did during the next dozen years of our history. On the other hand but few tenance, $130,050.

Deaf and Dumb Asylum, $44,791.

Blind Asylum, $33,972.

Agricultural College and Model Farm, $26,666.

We regret again, that had the Macdonald Government remained in power until this day the probabilities are that the expenses of all these institutions of his inception would have been just as great as they now are, and it would have been just as fair to have laid the same charge of "increased expenditure" as it now is.

What one of these public institutions would the Conservative leaders of today close up? Would it be the London Insane Asylum, with its hundreds of unfortunates? Would it be the Blind or the Deaf and Dumb Asylums, which are now such a source of blessing and comfort to so many hundreds of our unfortunate fellow creatures? Would it be the Agricultural College? Mr. Whitney and all his colleagues on Thursday stood for its continuance, but some curtailment of expenses. Would it be the Government House? These same Conservatives voted to have it continued, though some items have been reduced. Would it be the Central Prison? The hundreds now maintained there at Provincial Government expense would in that case be huddled in our county jails, at the expense of the municipalities, or sent to the penitentiary, where the expense per prisoner to the tax-payer has been far greater during all these years of Conservative rule at Ottawa.

FURTHER INSTITUTIONS NEEDED.

The growing needs of the Province during the past twenty years have made it necessary to establish a number of other large and extensive institutions, every one of which entails yearly increased expenditure. Among these have been additional Lunatic Asylums at Hamilton, Mimico, Rockwood and Brockville, every one of which is now well filled, and not one of which even Conservative economists would propose to close. A large Idiot Asylum has also been established at Orillia—a necessary and humane institution. The Andrew Mercer female prison and reformatory has also been built at Toronto, and none would now propose to close it. A Juvenile Reformatory has been established at Penetanguishene, and it is also a necesssary institution. Besides it has been necessary to increase the capacity of every one of the old asylums, at enormously increased expenditure, and to add jails and lock-ups in a number of the newly erected counties and districts that had not an existence twenty years ago.

These and a hundred other items of necessary expense that must needs

HUMAN NATURE, YOU KNOW.

A New Danger From Typewriters Employed in Partnership.

"It's human nature," declared Brown to his stenographer. "He doesn't want me to know; but I will know. Mixer, my partner, won't tell me a word about it, but I'll find out, if I have to search his papers. Idea! I, his partner, can't be told of the business of the firm."

Mixer had a client. Every afternoon for a week she had walked into Mixer's private office, and an earnest conversation always ensued behind partly-closed doors. It was evidently a divorce case. But Mixer, though Brown had repeatedly hinted that he should divulge, wouldn't drop a hint.

"Mighty swell client you have there," Brown ventured to remark one day.

"Think so, do you?" asked Mixer with a smile, but not a hint of the inside of the case.

Brown determined to know what the case was. That same afternoon the fair client came in, and, with an entrancing smile, vanished into Mixer's private office, without even the formality of a knock. When she came out she was shutting up her purse. That gave Brown an idea.

"Mixer," said he a short time afterward, with a wink at the stenographer, "better divide up on that retainer, hadn't you?"

"What retainer?"

"Oh, the swell client—you know."

"Well, you see, I'm running this case alone."

"You are?" cried Brown, with some show of feeling, for the partnership papers demanded division of the spoils.

"Yes," was the reply, "that money was for a new dress."

"New dress!" gasped Brown. "This is scandalous, sir. I must insist that you tell me the name of this woman."

"Very well, Mr. Brown. She's my wife."

That night Mixer and his wife discussed "the case" over sparkling champagne. Brown had sent it up.

"It's human nature, you know," slyly remarked his stenographer the next morning when Mixer came in. But Brown only glared at her over his glasses.

A HEALTHFUL PURSUIT.

HOP PICKING IN PRINCE EDWARD COUNTY—A RACY ACCOUNT OF THE OPERATION.

DEAR EDITOR:—Your correspondent has been, for the past week or so, enjoying an outing in one of the many hop-yards of this county, and news being rather scarce, we thought a short account of this most picturesque feature of country out-door life might interest some of your readers even though they live in a hop-growing district. We give as our excuse the innocent question of a certain young lady from Lennox, who seeing a hop-yard for the first time, inquired, "what sort of berries are growing on those poles?"

To begin then, 7 o'clock in the morning finds us wending our way to the yard, greatly enjoying the cool, fresh air, the pungent aroma of the hops, the glimpses we catch, between the rows of poles with their graceful vines, of bright colored calico gowns and sun-bonnets of the women and girls who have already commenced work, the hum of voices, and the sparkling dew, we take our place at the box that has been assigned us, and call "pole," where-upon the box-tender comes and cuts a vine near the root, pulls the supporting pole, and places it on the box, ready to be stripped of its scented cones. Each box is divided into four sections, each one holding six bushels, and are thirty inches deep. The pickers are paid, this year 30 cents per box, or one cent per inch.

Soon all the pickers are in the yard and the box-tender is kept pretty busy pulling poles, stripping the ones that have been picked and piling them in heaps ready for the next year. The vines are also piled into heaps to be burned. The hops must be picked free from stems and leaves, and it is necessary to work with a will as they settle very fast, but when two of a family pick at opposite sections they "dump over" when each have half a box and thus make much more than where one is picking alone. When the box is full the call "empty" runs through the yard and the yard-boss comes and takes a look at it to see that it is all right. Then the hops are emptied into a great sack ready to be taken to the kiln to dry. The forenoon soon passes, with laughter, jest and song, and then comes the noonday meal. We gladly troop off to the hop house where a table is spread for us, liberally supplied with hot tea, potatoes and corn. We remove our thick gloves, get our dinner-baskets and take our place, and oh! the appetites we take with us. All the doctors' tonics in the world fall short of hop-picking. You feel yourself growing stronger every day, the blood courses more buoyantly through your veins and a new vigor comes to mind and body. The dinner hour is a merry one, and all declare it better than a picnic. Next comes a race up stairs to see the kiln, a peep into the furnace rooms and then away again to the yard. As the afternoon draws to a close we get restless and visit the other boxes for a chat, then back and to work again. One of the leading questions in the yard is "what are you going to do with your "hop-money"? and woe unto you if you do not tell. Night comes at last and after another pleasant chat with the pickers we start for home tired but happy.

SICK HEADACHE and Constipation are promptly cured by Burdock Pills.

during the next dozen years of our history. On the other hand but few of our provincial public institutions which now cost us so much for their necessary annual maintenance had then commenced their existence. No wonder the surplus grew during that time.

WHAT HE THEN PROVIDED FOR.

Here are some of the items of increased public expenditure that Premier Macdonald himself provided for, before the defeat of his Government.

1. He enacted a law during the last session of the first parliament providing for the distribution of at least nearly one half of the total surplus in the shape of railway bonuses, and he thus bound himself to at once begin to "squander" that fine surplus and also to largely increase the after average expenditure of each year.

2. He also began the erection of a number of our largest and most expensive public institutions which have ever since been a source of largely increased expenditure, and they would have caused the same expense had his government remained in power. Among these expensive buildings began in his day, but the completion and maintenance of which has since so much increased expense, many be enumerated the following:

1. The Lieut-Governor's official residence at Toronto, costing in the long run, hundreds of thousands.

2. The Central Prison, at Toronto, also costing in the long run, hundreds of thousands.

3 The Insane Asylum at London, another very expensive and large institution.

4 The Deaf and Dumb Asylum, at Belleville, large and costly.

5 The Blind Asylum, at Brantford, costing in the long run over a hundred thousand.

6 The Model Farm and Agricultural College, at Mimico. He purchased and paid for a considerable tract of land there, near the city of Toronto, that turned out wholly unsuited for any such purpose and which had to be disposed of afterwards at a very considerable sacrifice and a more suitable farm purchased at Guelph.

Now, scarcely one of these extensive and expensive projects had been completed at the time of the Macdonald government downfall, though all were under way and they were handed over as an expensive legacy to their successors. They have had to be efficiently maintained ever since, at enormous public cost. And now the Member for Lennox strikes the key note of demanding the defeat of the Liberals because they have increased the annual expenditures, and that largely because of the existence of these very institutions! The other Conservative orators all pitch their songs to the same key.

Is it just fair to state such a partial and one sided case to the electors and to withhold at the same time such important explanations, with which many farmers of to-day are not familiar? Stronger words might be used.

WHAT THESE NOW COST.

Laying aside the enormous first cost of the erection and establishment of these institutions, exery one of them inaugurated by the economical Sandfield Macdonald, let us turn to the Ontario estimates for this year and see what is now the necessary annual expenses in connection with their maintenance.

Expenses, contingencies, repairs etc. of the Government House, over and and above salaries and the like $3,879.

The Patrons attempted to have these sums struck off, but every Conservative M. P. P., who spoke here last Thurday voted against them.

Central Prison expenses and maintenance $60,025.

No objection is now made to this sum. Not one dollar of it was required in Macdonald's time.

London Insane Asylum, main-necessary expense that must needs have been established to meet the growing wants of the country, no matter what party was in power, have all tended to swell up the increased expense items now complained of. But is it fair and honest for any opposition to thus prarade the bare figures about the country and withhold from the people an honest explanation in regard to them? Does it not look like an attempt to presume too much on a lack of intelligence among the audiences now being appealed to.

STILL GREATER UNFAIRNESS.

Besides all this, is it not a well known fact, to the older electors especially, that the Liberal Government, after it came into power, distributed a million and a half of that surplus directly to the tax-payers of the country, through the various municipal councils? There was not a municipality in existence throughout all Ontario that did not get a fair and just share of that distribution. The Township of Richmond received $6,000 out of that distribution, and the tax-payers have been receiving the interest on the investment ever since. Ernesttown, the township in which the Doctor resides, received as its share $9,000 from that distribution which it has had invested ever since, and the tax-payers have a yearly income therefrom. I think it was over $40,000 that came to the municipalities of Lennox alone. Some went to pay off old debts, as in Napanee, I think. Some went to build better roads and safer bridges, as in Fredericksburgh. Some was invested in aiding the school funds. Every council made its own disposal, and the Government's intention that every tax-payer should get his fair and equal share was carried out, as far as it was possible for the government to do so.

Now, can it be credited that Dr. Meacham and his Conservative colleagues actually added in this generous distribution as a part of the "increased average annual expenses" of the Liberal party? Yet such is actually the case, and now they call on the tax-payers of Lennox, who have been thus benefitted to rise up and condemn such extravagance!

They prepare figures to show that yearly expenses, thus increased by distributing a surplus and by thus completing public institutions ought not to have been increased! What can intelligent people think of tactics of that kind?

By Acute Indigestion. Wealth Would Not Buy Freedom—South American Nervine Broke the Shackles.

Reuben E. Truax, M.P., millowner and manufacturer, of Walkerton, Ont., writes of the great South American Nervine: "I had been for over ten years very much troubled with acute indigestion, tried many remedies and treatments and got little or no benefit. Your remedy was recommended to me. I obtained great relief from a few doses, and when I had taken only two bottles I felt entirely free from my ailment. I strongly recommend it and believe it will cure any who may be suffering as I did. Sold by A. W. Grange & Bro.

MENDING BROKEN TREES.

Peculiar Results of Half-Girdling With Wire Bands.

In going through an old orchard where the great gales of the fall of 1894 blew over many trees, cutting and splitting off half the tops of others, I was struck, says J. H. Hale, in The Connecticut Courant, with the amount of abuse a peach tree will stand and yet recover. In clearing up the wreckage some of the split trees were bolted together, others had wire bands put on, and still others had the broken half cut away entirely, the split trunks smoothed up with a drawing knife and the one-sided head shortened in to balance it a little better. Trees treated in the latter method, while having a scarred trunk, with bark only on one side, have full rounded-out heads, as good as though no harm had been

THE LENNOX FAIR.

The Lennox Fair, which was held here on Monday and Tuesday was a record breaker in point of attendance, but the exhibits were not up to the average of former years The first day opened cold and unpromising and the directors decided to call off the speeding in the ring and reserve it for the second day. The Baby Show in the evening drew out a large crowd and proved a decided success. The Citizens' Band was in attendance and enlivened the proceedings with some choice selections of music. A number of very pretty babies, all worthy of a prize, were displayed by their proud parents. The prize for the handsomest baby boy was carried off by Ibra B. Alcombrack. Hulett's prize of a $15 portrait, framed, was awarded to Jessie Schermehorn. The second prize was won by Gertie Warner, and the third by Onetina Huffman. Mrs. Finkle, of Napanee, and Mrs. Campbell, of Kingston, acted as Judges.

The weather on the second day proved propitious and the crowd in attendance was largely in excess of former years. The exhibits in the palace while not as large as last year was fully up to the the standard in quality. The root exhibit was very light. The display of ladies work was fully us to the average and proved an attractive feature of the show. Among the special exhibits M. S. Madole's fine exhibit of hardware and stoves is worthy of special mention. Mr. C. Maybee, of The Peoples' Fair also made a fine display. Mr. C. A. Graham's exhibit of robes, harness etc. was very fine.

J. W. Courtney, of Newburgh, and Jas. Elliott, of Tamworth each made a fine display of tanned goods, robes, etc.

J. S. Hulett's exhibit of photographic work of all kinds was greatly admired. His display has come to be looked upon as a feature of the show.

Mr. Chas. Boyes also made a fine display of photographic work.

Mr. Wm. Smpkins was on hand with an exhibit of sewing and knitting machines, and Mr. J. N. McCreary displayed the merits of the new Raymond.

F. W. Hart's exhibit of pianos and organs was fine.

The following firms exhibited Agricultural implements, Potter & Blanchard, Napanee, A. A. Connolly, Yarker, E. Stickney, Newburgh, C. A. Graham, Napanee. Webster & Boyes made a fine exhibit of carriages as did C. A. Graham.

Chas. Ward, of Colebrooke, had a fine pump on exhibition.

The Exhibition of horses, and cattle was really excellent and the judges had their work mapped out in arriving at a decision. —The sheep and pig exhibit was good also. The following is the prize list.

ed many limbs and left pretty poor trees. The bolted trees look fairly well, but none are so good as those that were thoroughly pruned, with no attempt to save broken limbs. This experience covered about 1000 trees, and in any future breaking or splitting down I shall cut everything away, confident that however lopsided a tree may be two years' new growth will put it in better shape than by any other method. A peculiar result of half-girdling some trees with wire bands was that the fruit borne on them has been larger and of brighter color, ripening from ten days to two weeks earlier than the same varieties of trees without wire bands. This might be an advantage in some seasons with certain varieties, and if only a portion of a tree were girdled at on time, no serious harm would come of it.

Tree Attract Lightning.

An isolated tree offers a most dangerous attraction to lightning. In woods the peril is diminished, because the electricity is scattered. Trees with roots deep in humid soil are more apt to be struck than those in drier spots. Trees in damp places are always conductors of electricity. Lightning prefers oaks and rarely touches beeches. Resistance to electrical discharges varies accordingly to the proportion of oily matter contained in the wood. The poplar possesses but little greasy substance and is a good conductor. It is dangerous to those who trust it for shelter, but if planted not nearer than ten metres from a dwelling proves to be a good lightning rod. If certain poplars are easily struck by electrical fluid, it is because their roots are in damp soil. All isolated trees should be avoided during a thunderstorm.

Decrease in Birth Rate.

It is a cause of great anxiety in France that the birth rate is less than the death rate, but the state of affairs in some portions of the United States is even more serious. While in France the birth rate is 22 per 1000, in Nebraska it is but 16.30 per 1000; in Maine 17.99 per 1000; New Hampshire, 18.4 per 1000; Vermont, 18.5; California, 19.4; Connecticut, 21.3; Massachusetts, 21.5; Rhode Island has 22.5 per 1000, a little more than France; Wyoming has 21.8 per 1000 and Oregon 22.5. If it were not for immigration the population would be gradually falling off, and according to statistics the inhabitants of New England and the Pacific Coast will be replaced by another race within a period varying from 16 to 200 years.

The Mississippi River.

According to calculations of John Birkenbine of Philadelphia, the drainage area of the Mississippi River is one and one-fourth millions of square miles, including nearly all of the country from the Alleghenies to the Rockies and from Canada to the Gulf of Mexico. In his communication to the Engineers' Club, Mr. Birkenbine estimates that one inch of rain falling evenly over this area would equal 21,780,000,000,000 gallons of water. The average yearly fall in the Mississippi watershed averages from 20 to 43 inches according to locality. The river has an average flow of 664,000 cubic feet per second.

Sugar Good for Athletes.

Alpine climbers, who seldom eat candy at home, are said to appreciate it highly when on their excursions. Guides are fond of it, as a great source of muscular force. Experiments have recently been made in Germany to demonstrate the value of sugar to those who perform hard labor. The Prussian Ministry of War is satisfied that muscular work done when natural sugar (cane or beet sugar) was used, was superior to that when saccharin formed a part of the diet. The blood is poor in sugar after muscular exertion, but a small quantity eaten gives back the lost energy.

THE KICKING COW.

How a Determined Man Can Subdue Her Without Violence.

It would be difficult, I believe, to find a dairyman of any extent who does not occasionally have in his herd a cow that gives much annoyance from the habit of kicking while being milked. There are a great many prescribed means of subduing such animals, and most milkers have found some plan that works fairly well. Usually really vicious cows have to submit to fixtures of ropes, straps or the like, but even these can be done without if the milker is a strong, resolute fellow who has not the least fear of his cow, and will not lose control of his temper. One plan I know to work well, says a writer in Farmer's Advocate, is to tie the cow's head close and secure, so that she cannot jump forwards or backwards. Then set the pail a little way out from her, bend over and place the head very firmly against her groin, and with the left hand grasp the back near teat very firmly and commence milking with the other hand. In all probability she will set up a furious and determined opposition, but if the milker is persistent and stays at his work without a flinch she will soon lose confidence in her ability to kick herself free, and will give up considerably exhausted and subdued. Two or three determined efforts will subdue very bad cases, rendering them ready to stand peaceably for weeks together. Occasionally she returns to her old vice after a time, when another trial of strength and power of endurance will have to be gone through with and will usually suffice. In breaking a heifer or a kicking cow rough usage is unnecessary and unwise. By the plan outlined a really bad case can be milked and subdued in spite of herself by a strong, determined man.

Kidney Trouble Cured.

A Well Known Hotel-keeper Relates his Experience.

He Suffered Greatly from Kidney Trouble and Indigestion—He Doctored for a Long Time Without Getting Any Relief.

From the Standard, Cornwall.

The march of the world's progress is forced, protracted and continuous, the competition for supremacy is keen. The man of business must keep rank if he would secure any coveted measure of success. The watchfulness, vigilance and thought involved in modern superintendency produces a severe strain on the physical and mental powers of modern business men, and exposes them to the attacks of certain diseases. Considering that much depends on health in this struggle, it behooves those who would be victorious, to guard against the first approach of disease. Neglect of early adjustment of digestive and kidney disorders is often fraught with dire results, added to this is the unpardonable trifling with health by experimenting with all manner of worthless decoctions. It is simply invaluable to make the acquaintance of a safe and effective remedy such as Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. James Macpherson, hotel keeper in the villiage of Lancaster, Glengarry county, has done business for a number of years in Lancaster, and having successfully catered for the patronage of the travelling public therefore is favorably known not only at home but also abroad. In conversation with a newspaper reporter he enumerated some of his ailments and how he was cured. About two years ago he said, "my whole digestive apparatus seemed to become disordered. Some days I could move around, then again I would be obliged to go to bed. I tried several things but with indifferent success. Occasionally I felt relieved, but in a day or two the old symptoms would return with a more depressing effect. This kind of thing went on until I became troubled with my kidneys, which was a very annoying addition to my sufferings. I was restless, with a sensation of sickness at the stomach, with intermittent pain in the small of my back. I was miserable enough when I consulted the doctor who probably did me and despondency the magic virtues of Paine's Celery Compound bring joy and new life! These are the leading facts in the following statement made by Mrs. G. Stone, of Eganville, Ont.

"For more than twelve years I was afflicted with kidney, stomach and female troubles, and had been attended by five doctors, and tried medicine after medicine, without any good results.

"My sufferings a year ago from the kidneys and stomach were dreadful. I was in such a state that I thought I could not live, and concluded there was no use trying other medicines.

"I was advised, however, to try Paine's Celery Compound, and finally decided to give it a trial. Before I had finished the first bottle I had improved very much, and after the use of a few more bottles I had not been so well for long years, and am now altogether a different person. The use of Paine's Celery Compound also banished my nervousness. I can therefore recommend Paine's Celery Compound to any one suffering from kidney, stomach and female troubles."

One of Caribou's bright 4-year-old girls, in answer to a question, surprised and amused her hearers. The conversation among the older people was in relation to heaven, and some one asked the little miss if she did not want to go to heaven when she died? The young girl turned, looked at her father, and said:

"No! I don't want to go to heaven. I want to go where papa goes."—Kennebec Journal.

Murderer (just captured in a dive, to his companion)—Good-by, pard; we shall meet again in the wax-figure museum.—Fliegende Blaetter.

Force of Habit.

"Did you speak to the father of the girl you wish to marry?" said one young man.

"Yes," replied the other.

"Did he give you any encouragement?"

"He seemed to think he did. He is a politician, and has been haunted by constituents ever since election. When I told him the ambition of my life, he said very gravely that it was seldom anybody secured exactly what he desired; he could see his way clear to making me the groom at his daughter's wedding, but he'd see what he could do about getting me the place of best man."—Washington Star.

Pain in the Back. DEAR SIRS,—I was troubled with pain in the back for months, and after trying several remedies without effect, thought I would use Hagyard's Yellow Oil. I am glad to say that after using two bottles I was completely cured, and cannot recommend this excellent remedy too highly.

A HANDY TOOL BOX.

part of the farm to repair a broken gate, sled or some other farm tool that can not be easily taken to the shop, you can easily do so with this box. It is an improvement over the ordinary carpenter's tool box inasmuch as it has a better handhold, for by this arrangement of handle you can balance it so nicely in your hand. Make an ordinary box 31 inches long, 10 inches wide and 5 inches deep; make handle 32 inches long and 1x2 inches wide and fasten with machine bolts as per cut. Round off the corners between AA. B is a block on bottom and against one side partly sawed down from the top for holding saws. You can carry two or more saws, a set of planes, square, hammer, level, try square, nails, bolts, etc., etc., without dulling the tools at all. If necessary to carry the box through the rain throw some rain apron over the box and grip down over the handle.

How to Feed Poultry Rations.

Of almost as much importance as the foods is a knowledge of the proper way to feed them. To over-feed is actually worse than the opposite treatment. But with proper knowledge and thorough appreciation of that which is being aimed at, the two extremes will be avoided. It is in the medium course that success lies. The beginner is tempted to give more food to his hens which are beginning to lay well, under the impression that he will get better results in so doing. The experienced poultryman will tell you that to avoid over-feeding is one of the hardest rules to observe. It is the cause of much of the ills that poultry suffer. More, it is fatal when practised for any length of time. To further stimulate hens that are doing their best is to thrash the horse going at his top speed to make him go quicker. The twin factor in judicious feeding is exercise. The three great factors in the winter production of eggs are cut bone (or meat), green stuff and exercise. Cut bone should be fed in quantity of one pound to every 16 hens, or one ounce to each hen. Feed three times per week or once daily if hens are laying well.

Green stuff.—Cabbages can be hung from the ceiling to within 2 1-2 feet of the floor. Feed mangels, carrots, turnips, etc., raw or boil the latter and mix with ground grains, into a stiff mash. Clover hay should be cut into quarter inch lengths and steamed by placing in a pail and pouring boiling water over it the night before it is wanted for use. Cover the pail after pouring in the boiling water. So steamed it may be fed alone or mixed in with mash. Lawn clippings may be similarly treated.

Exercise.—Use all ingenuity to keep the layers in exercise from morning till they go to roost. Throw all grain fed into litter, composed of chaff, straw, cut hay, oat hulls, dry leaves, etc., which should be on the floor to the depth of 4, 5, or 6 inches.—From report of A. G. Gilbert, Dominion Experimental Farms.

Broken Crockery, Feed For Chickens.

An excellent way to dispose of broken crockery that at times accumulates about the dooryard is to pound the pieces until they are as fine as grains of corn, and put them into a box or scatter them over the ground where the poultry can have access to them. There should always be a box or bin in the yard—preferably under cover—where the fowls can get to it at all times, into which shells, coal, broken plaster, crushed and burned bone, crushed crockery, etc., should be put. The box should never be empty.

A subscriber asks about feeding broken glass to poultry. We have never made a practice of using it, but know of a number of farmers who do and like it. They also claim that no evil effects result from its use. It seems to be an unnatural and unnecessary article to use, especially when gravel, bones, crushed stone, crockery, etc., are so easily obtained and prepared for use.

Most of us know from experience how sharp are the edges of broken glass; how fowls can swallow splinters of it with out lacerating their throats and mouths is indeed puzzling. Once in the gizzard, however, it provides awful sharp teeth.—Rural Californian.

Shortness of Breath. "Since last year I have had serious heart trouble caused by malaria. Shortness of breath, smothering spells on retiring, violent palpitation, etc., often made me gasp for breath. On procuring Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills I found to my surprise and delight that they gave almost instant relief. I got healthy, restful sleep, my heart troubles disappeared, and I now feel very well and strong indeed." Mr. Hugh Moore, Ingersoll Ont., makes this statement for the public good.

some good, because I felt relieved. The doctor's medicine was taken and his directions obeyed, but I did not improve. I had heard of the fame of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. My wife believed in them and urged me to try them. I am glad I did so, for after taking one box I felt better, and I continued taking the pills until I was completely cured. This summer I had an attack of the same complaints and I found Dr. Williams' Pink Pills as effective as before. I had this advantage, my knowledge and belief in the pills saved me from costly and tedious experimenting such as I had undergone previously. I may further add that both myself and Mrs. Macpherson have derived much benefit from the use of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, and I can cordially recommend them to those who are suffering similarly."

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills cure by going to the root of the disease. They renew and build up the blood, and strengthen the nerves, thus driving disease from the system. Avoid imitations by insisting that every box you purchase is enclosed in a wrapper bearing the full trade mark, Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People.

"I want," said the recently married man in the novelty store, "a lady's belt."

"Yes, sir," said the polite shop empress. "What size?"

A blush mantled the customer's brow, and he swallowed twice in rapid succession. Then he said:

"I don't know exactly. Let me have a yard stick, please."

And as he placed it along the inside of his arm, from shoulder to wrist, the shop empress remarked beneath her breath to her chum, "He ain't the first he looks, is he, Jenny?"—Cincinnati Commercial Tribune.

With Hood's Sarsaparilla, "Sales Talk," and now that this medicine has enjoyed public confidence and patronage to a greater extent than accorded any other proprietary medicine. This is simply because it possesses greater merit and produces greater cures than any other. It is not what we say, but what Hood's Sarsaparilla does, that tells the story. All advertisements of Hood's Sarsaparilla, like Hood's Sarsaparilla itself, are honest. We have never deceived the public, and this with its superlative medicinal merit, is why the people have abiding confidence in it, and buy

The Limits of Patience.

"Mary, I have stood it long enough."

A determined expression lent to his countenance a Napoleonic air at 6 per cent. as he proceeded.

"I can stand most things. I did not kick when you took to the wheel. I even consented to cook my own supper when you were out with your club wheeling——"

The determined expression loaned his countenance some more Napoleonic air on the same terms.

"I did not object when you strapped a couple of baby carriages on the front of your wheel and took the family with you; I was meek as a lamb when you cut down my twelve-dollar pants to make a pair of bloomers; it didn't bother me to any great extent when you called on me to pay a pair of fines for riding without a light, but——"

He borrowed some more Napoleonic air.

——"I object like thundering blazes when you wear my only pair of suspenders! Take 'em off, Mary! Take 'em off!"

There Are Others.

That Would Be Different.

"Yes," said the patient listener suddenly, as he interrupted the eloquent Altruist, who for over an hour had been pouring into his ear a mixture of bile and misinformation regarding the relationship of labor and capital, "I admit all you have argued, I have read Lloyd's book on "Wealth Against Commonwealth," and own that he has made a powerful case against John D. Rockefeller. He has shown him to be a man who is both high-handed and under-handed, a man who will do anything to acquire money, and yet I cannot so much blame Rockefeller. He is the result of existing conditions. Now, tell me honestly, what would you do yourself if you were in Rockefeller's place?"

The eyes of the ardent reformer bulged out like the unnecessary knobs on a modern brass bedstead.

"I," he almost shrieked. "If I found myself in his place I'd cling to that place like a sick kitten to a hot brick."—New York Journal.

He grumbled away on a patch of ground,
"Waiting for something to happen;"
Year after year the same old round,
"Waiting for something to happen;"
The moments he had to spare he spent
In "waiting for something to happen;"
His hair grew gray, his shoulders bent,
But he grubbed and he loafed, and was content
To "wait for something to happen."

His tools wore out, and his ground grew poor,
"Waiting for something to happen,"
But he grumbled and loafed and he still was sure
That "something would some day happen,"
And many a chance he let go past,
"Waiting for something to happen,"
Until there came a day, at last,
When clouds above his head were cast—
Something had finally happened!

PERMITTED HIM TO SMOKE.

But Didn't Allow Her Husband to Do It —Read and Learn Why.

It happened during the recent cool spell, and the man in the case will always think of her as the nicest little woman. She was young and her cheeks were so delightfully pink that more than one person looked at her with admiration as she boarded the car, followed by one of those nondescript females which very pretty women usually select as friends. The car was almost full, and they took the seat facing those devoted to smokers.

Only one man was smoking, and he politely took his cigar out of his mouth and said to the pretty passenger. "Pardon me, madam, do you object to smoke?"

"Not at all, sir," was the smiling reply, "pray go on; I like it."

When they got off fifteen minutes later the nondescript female, still with a dazed look on her face, said: "Why, Carrie, how could you tell that man you liked smoke, when only yesterday I heard you threaten Joe with a divorce if he——"

"That has nothing to do with the case, dear," said the pretty woman calmly; "when I took out this jacket this morning I noticed a mole hole in the sleeve. Now, nothing kills moths sooner than tobacco, so I——"

"But why not let Joe smoke the moths out of it"

"And furnish him with an argument in favor of tobacco in the house? No, thank you, dear. Now, this man is a stranger, who will never see me again, so it makes no difference."

And the polite passenger never knew.

"Sir," said the fiery little fellow, with some show of temper, "you have my umbrella."

"Your umbrella," exclaimed the big man, who had just picked up the umbrella that the little fellow had deposited in the corner.

"Yes, sir; my umbrella," repeated the little fellow. "And you were just about to walk away with it."

"Yes, yes, of course; merely a joke, you know," explained the big man putting it back.

"Joke! Joke!" roared the little man. "Do you consider it a joke to pick up a nice new umbrella and walk away with it?"

A Newspaper Sermon Upon Felix's "A Convenient Season."

Felix trembled, and answered, Go thy way for this time; when I have a convenient season I will call for thee.—Acts, xxiv., 25.

Felix was very wily, very timid and very selfish, as most of us are.

Under the circumstances in which the world has entangled itself it is rather difficult to be anything else. What with the teasings and cajolings of personal ambition it requires a certain amount of heroism for a man to do what he knows he ought to do.

There is no doubt that goodness is the best spiritual investment a man can make; that uprightness, integrity, generosity, charity are qualities of character whose value is beyond all appraisal. And yet ambition is an orator with such persuasive speech that it can make the worse appear the better and half convince us that an act at which our conscience revolts will produce the happiness we long for. We allow ourselves to be deceived by specious arguments, and unwholesome lives mingled with unspoken regrets are the consequence.

We all intend to rectify things by and by, but life slips away, the years like a swift flowing current sweep us into old age, and what we hoped to do remains forever unaccomplished, so far as this life is concerned. Beginning with false premises, we inevitably and logically reach an unsatisfactory conclusion. With the power to make ourselves noble, we waste our energy and die in the sad consciousness that we have not done the half of what we intended to do, and have not done that half as well as we were capable of doing it.

It was so with Governor Felix, and it is so with the majority of us. He saw that Paul's doctrine was the only safe doctrine, and he determined to adopt the principles propounded by him, but it would be more convenient to do so at some future time, and very inconvenient to do so just then. The chance to change himself from a bad ruler into a good man was lost, and it never again presented itself.

There is a similar story told of the wild and dissipated youth who afterward became St. Augustine. He seems to have had two natures, as most of us have. On a certain occasion, when his nobler nature was in the ascendent, he fell on his knees, crying, "O, Lord, make me holy!" but immediately his ignoble nature wrestled for the mastery, and he added, "But not yet!"

We all have the same experience.

THE PASSING OF ISIS.

And thus the Light of Egypt was preserved
In other lands, still guarded by the "wise,"
That else had been in final darkness lost.
For now indeed the time was nigh at hand
When Isis from her cherished home must stray,
Abandoning her temples on the Nile,
Those gorgeous temples where the radiant light
Of morning in a flood of glory
Bewildering, through pillared halls and all
The brightly tinted courts, where still was heard,
Day after day to greet the rising sun,
The Matin hymns of white-robed hierophants;
And in the hallowing light of evening still
The choral music of the vespers thrilled
The worshippers till twilight drew the veil
And solemn silence brooded o'er the scene?
And now full soon the fateful time drew nigh
When Isis from her temple must depart,
Ejected from her home upon the Nile;
And premonitions of the change appeared—
Strange portents, voices, spectral visitants,
Oppressing men with bodings of unrest
And vague presentiment of coming woe.
'Twas said her statues had been seen to weep,
And many from their places were removed,
And sobs and wailings issued from the crypts
And mingled even with the vesper hymns;
And also later in the night was heard

"Look at any comic paper and see if it is not so regarded."

And the little man could not deny that it had been so regarded ever since the time that Noah went in out of the wet. —Chicago Post.

A Fable.

A Good, Virtuous Little Boy saw a Dirty, Tough Little Boy on the street.

"Oh," said he to his Fond Governess, "I will go to the poor, wicked, tough Little Boy and give him some of my nice toys, since probably he does not receive any."

And his Fond Governess applauding his intentions, he went out on the street.

"Now, you dirty, wicked Little Boy," he began, about to offer his toys, when the other, not relishing the names, hauled off and smashed the Virtuous Little Boy on his Virtuous Little Jaw, and really damaged him considerably. When rescued the Good Little Boy determined never to mix with those horrid creatures again.

Moral: Some stiff-necked, sniffling, red-tape charitable organization can deduce one for itself.—New York Journal.

A Sign of the Sad.

The rising generation of Irish boys seem to be fairly well informed as to their country's indebtedness to England. An Irish school inspector the other day was examining a class in geography. He had put a question regarding longitude, and on receiving a correct answer continued: "And now where is latitude?" There was a silence for a little. Then an Oliver Twist-like youth, with a broad grin on his honest face, gave the reply: "Please sir, we have no latitudes in Ireland; the British Government won't allow us any."—Ave Maria.

G. A. BROWNE, H. B. SHERWOOD
Superintendent

R. J. CARTER,

Two skirmish with each other and nothing decisive is attained—neither obtains the mastery. In other instances there is a pitched battle between the two, and though the fortunes of war waver for a while, the saintly wins the day and the evil surrenders unconditionally.

No man knows himself until that battle has been fought. So long as it remains in doubt whether you are to be governed by principle or by expediency, by justice and truth or by personal ambition, so long you are building without any solid foundation, and your future will depend largely on the temptations which may happen to come your way. If you have clear weather you will get on without any serious mishap, and appear to be a better man and a stronger man than you really are; but if some evil minded chance knocks at your door with its promise of aggrandizement you will be in danger of being so dazzled that conscience will retire in dismay and despair.

This "more convenient season" is a mere figment of the imagination, the device of the spirit of evil, a false prophet, a dose of opium thrust down the throat of your better self. There never was and there never will be a more convenient sason than now. The man who waits until to-morrow always waits until the day after. Difficulties accumulate with the passage of time.

If you are about to start on a journey, and, standing in the doorway, watching the first snowflakes of a coming storm, you say, "I will go in the afternoon," or, "I will go in the morning," the chances are that you will wait until it is too late to go at all. Every minute makes your task harder to accomplish. Start at once and you will triumph over the elements. The falling flakes will not impede your progress, and you may reach your destination before the storm bursts in its first fury. But if you wait you make a mistake which may possibly prove fatal. The snow heaps itself in drifts, and by the time you have fully made up your mind to start the roads have become impassable.

In spiritual concerns the same rule holds good, as many a poor, forlorn soul can testify, and as all of us, for that matter, can testify to a certain extent. The habit which you ought to break is now like a spider's web. One sweep of the will and it is gone; delay and the web hardens into threads of steel, and only a giant's strength can break it.

If you say, "I will mend myself by and by," you will find that your "by and by" will never arrive. It is a delusion, a rainbow, a dream, a nothing. What is worth doing at all is worth doing now. One effort, one mighty effort, calling on all the hosts of heaven for help, and you will make a man of yourself.—New York Herald.

Alphabet of Proverbs.

A grain of prudence is worth a pound of craft.
Boasters are cousins to liars.
Denying a fault doubts it.
Envy shoots at others and wounds herself.
Foolish fear doubles danger.
God teaches us good things by our own hands.
He has hard work who has nothing to do.
It costs more to revenge wrongs than to suffer them.
Knavery is the worst trade.
Learning makes a man fit company for himself.
Modesty is a guard to virtue.
Not to hear conscience is the way to silence it.
One hour to-day is worth two to-morrow.
Proud looks make foul work in fair faces.
Quiet conscience is quiet sleep.
Richest is he that wants least.
Small faults indulged are little thieves that let in greater ones.
The boughs that bear most hang lowest.
Upright walking is sure walking.
Virtue and happiness are mother and daughter.
Wise men make more opportunities than they find.
You never lose by doing a good act.
Zeal without knowledge is fire without light.

Caine's "Christian."

Mr. Caine's Christian is a man of Christlike mould. He is Robert Storm, the son of a peer, who, turning his back upon station and wealth, goes out into the wilderness of London, smiting the wealthy and the powerful with scathing words, and seeking to reclaim the fallen men and the fallen women with whom he casts his lot. Over and over again his likeness to Christ is insisted upon.

Do not let me be misunderstood. Mr. Caine's Christian is no Christ. He is no reincarnated Godhead. He is a very human follower of the Master, eagerly willing in spirit, but weak in the flesh. On the struggles of that spirit and that flesh depends the most vivid interest of the book.

a parting hymn sublime and exquisite,
That with its cadence flooded all the place
Till passing hence it in the distance died
In softest murmurs like whispering wind!
And oft-times too at midnight hour was seen
About the temples in their priestly robes
A spectral host that in procession moved
Amid the shrines through halls and corridors,
And Nile-ward hence along the avenues
Through lines of sphinxes on their pedestals
And underneath those frowning idol-gods
The solemn guardians of those mighty shrines
So weird and awful in midnight hour,
Colossal statues seated and upright,
Clad with the radiance of the mystic moon
That with the clamour of her light and shade
Transformed them into ghostly shapes, that seemed
As spectral as the spectral host that passed
Beneath them with their goddess to the Nile,
Where draped in sable lay the royal barge
Along the wharf in readiness equipped
To bear her hence, a wanderer once more,
Which hardly had the ghostly pageant reached
Than all the deck with bustle was astir,
Then rose a cry which plash of oars, and lo!
The sable bark was speeding on its way.
And then the pageant into air desolved
And all was silent, save the moaning wind
And lonely water washing on the shore!
Such were the premonitions that foretold
The passing hence of Isis from her home
Where she ages upon ages dwelt,
A Goddess worshipped by the multitude—
Their chief Ideal of redemptive Love!
Having her type in Nature with her Child,
In nature with her child, Humanity,
Her latest offspring from the Beast transformed
To beauty in the human form devine!
A model thus for every time and clime
Though often marred by priests and fanatics
With cruelties and superstitions vile.
And thus she sped upon her lonely way
To other lands, deep veiled and sorrowful
Bearing her message to humanity,
The model still of perfect Womanhood,
However named, whether called Isis now
Or Ishtar, Ceres or the Jewish Maid;
The same in all, her worship being still,
Though modified to suit the time and place
The gentle worship of Maternity
Embodied in the Woman and the Child,
Not as an idol set before the crowd,
But as the Mother of the family,
Incentive both to tender sympathy,
Potent persuaders of our human kind,
That conquered harsh barbarity by love
Till from the brute the Angel was evolved;
Not one alone upraised above the Race
But legions upon legions multiplied,
A mighty multitude, increasing still
Till all attain their being's end and aim
Ascending to the heights of Deity!

MODERN CHIVALRY.

An Incident That is Worthy of the Pen of a Genius.

The story of a whole company of soldiers enlisting to be grafted for duty in bits to save the life of a suffering little girl is worthy of Kipling. It is, however, a true story from Illinois. A young girl named Florence Connell in attempting to fill a gasoline stove was horribly burned. Usually a person whose skin is so much burned as hers dies, but she survived, yet after six months' perfect care and treatment was still unhealed. The physician in charge proposed skin-grafting. Two healthy brothers of the girl offered first. "Take as much as you want, doctor, to save Florence," they said. Twenty patches were taken from one, forty-four from the other, and adjusted to the suffering sister's need. Then a third brother, who is captain of militia, Company A, submitted to the surgeon's knife and contributed thirty-three patches for his sister's healing. And then his whole company volunteered for the service. One after another offered themselves when needed.

The doctor accepted, picked out several members, and warned the others that he might have to call on some of them. To their honor and credit not one flinched, but all reported for duty, and from among them 125 more grafts were made. This has about finished the work, but if more patches are needed qualified subjects are ready. The girl is getting well, slowly but surely, and has gained twenty pounds during the past month. The doctor thinks she will be in condition to leave the hospital and go to her home "before snow flies," and the soldier boys will give a serenade, when she is well enough, to the little sister of the regiment.—Boston Transcript.

Some Tested Points in Diet.

The fact that milk has become extremely popular with all classes of physicians of late years is emphasized by a recent writer in The North American Review. Formerly a fever patient was forbidden to take the article, while in modern practice it is about the only food allowed, and a well-nigh exclusive diet of that liquid is said to be very efficacious in diabetes. At the German spas, Carlsbad, Wiesbaden, etc., a very little bread is allowed, the diet being mostly made up of milk, eggs, grapes and lean beef; a non-starch diet is the rule, bread, starchy vegetables and cereals being almost excluded. Rice is easily digested and an excellent food, except that it abounds in earth salts. Fruits are not only digested in the first stomach, but they have a large part of the nourishment already in a condition to be absorbed and assimilated as soon as eaten. The food elements in bread and cereals have to undergo a process of digestion in the stomach and then be passed on to the intestines for a still further chemical change before being of use to the human system, showing the advantage of a diet of lean meats and fruits.

Slang in the House of Commons.

An honorable member said in the House lately that they had the Government "on toast" for once. He added that if he might use a vulgar expression, he should say that the wild Irish had been "got at." "On toast," therefore, would seem to require no apology. Once on a time Mr. Bernal Osborne's use of the expression "being sat upon" caused some comment in another place. But we have progressed since then.—London Notes and Queries.

WHY SHE WAS OUT SHOPPING.

She Had Hidden in the Closet and Heard What He Said.

They met at the remnant counter in one of the big dry goods shops. One of them was evidently married and the other looked like a teacher.

"You look sort of haggard to-day, dear," said the teacher. "Didn't you sleep well last night?"

"Um-no," was the reply. "I—well, you see, James went to his club right after dinner, and I knew he meant to stay pretty late, because he told me so carefully that he expected to meet a Minneapolis man, with whom he hoped to do a nice little stroke of business. He also unnecessarily mentioned the fact that I should have the prettiest new frock in Chicago if he succeeded."

"Oh!"

"M'hm. Well, as it happened, I was going out myself; it was the evening for my card club, and I didn't really mind his going too, though, of course, I told him not to stay late."

"Yes. Well?"

"I reached home at 12.30 and found, to my horror, that he hadn't come yet. The truth is that I had let both of the maids go to a ball, and——"

"But I thought your husband told you never to do that."

"He did. But a man's place is at home with his wife, anyhow; besides, I knew that even if he found out that I had done it he would only scold a little, while if I refused to let Alma go she would probably leave and coax Christine

THE LATEST FASHIONS.

Bustles Will Be Features in Autumn Modes—Hints on Freshening Up.

Smaller sleeves are undoubtedly coming into fashion. The latest creations in Paris show scarcely any fullness. At present the most popular sleeve has a small puff at the top, and it is plain from the puff to the wrist. The puffing may be provided by the sleeve itself or by an additional piece of material. A modern model is made perfectly plain, except for a few plaits set in the shoulder seam. Sleeves continue to be cut long, but the point over the hand is not frequently seen. Lace frills over the hand, however, are much in vogue, and they are seen in most of the smartest toilets. Sleeves are also made with puffs and ruffles at the elbow. The autumn coat sleeves will be diminished in width, but a certain breadth will be allowed at the top to accommodate the inside sleeve. Bustles are coming in again; in fact, they are now worn by the most up-to-date women. They are very moderate affairs, and they will prove a boon to many slender women. The newest bustle is constructed in sections—that is, the hip pieces are cut out and padded to fit the figure. They are intended to be worn under the corsets. It is rumored that white stockings will be worn again. Clocks are also in fashion. Designs in stockings are much more elaborate than they used to be. Ribbed effects in black, alternated with colors, combined with embroidery, are deemed very smart. Scotch plaids in lisle and silk mixtures are especially attractive. Plain boot patterns in black, with colored tops, are among the novelties, as are also medallions of lace inserted in the insteps. It is stated that gloves will be worn with embroidered armlets, but they will have but a short life.

Biscuit colored linen is one of the most popular fabrics of the summer. A pretty model has a skirt wrought around the hem, with tall tapering sprays of white braiding and cording, the material being sufficiently heavy to hang well and show the embroidery.

A short tight fitting coat is drawn closely into the waist at the back, and also braided and corded in white. The coat opens slightly in front and has wide revers, one faced with tucked white muslin and narrow valenciennes lace, the other braided and corded with white embroidery. The chemisette is of tucked white muslin, which is set off to advantage by a waistcoat of scarlet cloth, richly embroidered in an oriental design in gold, silver, blue and yellow. The Russian blouse or moujik is much worn. One built of white cashmere, to be worn with a skirt of the same material, has

ONLY GENUINE MAN.

'TIS HE WHO STRIKES OUT HIS INDIVIDUAL LINE OF ACTION.

Why Individuality Is Not the Same as Genuineness—Pertinent Examples of the Quality Which Will Be Instantly Recognized by True People.

No man is genuine, says Woodrow Wilson in the September Atlantic, who is forever trying to pattern his life after the lives of other people—unless, indeed, he be a genuine dolt. But individuality is by no means the same as genuineness; for individuality may be associated with the most extreme and even ridiculous eccentricity, while genuineness we conceive to be always wholesome, balanced and touched with dignity. It is a quality that goes with good sense and self-respect. It is a sort of robust moral sanity, mixed of elements both moral and intellectual. It is found in natures, too strong to be mere trimmers and conformers, too well poised and thoughtful to fling off into intemperate protest and revolt. Laughter is genuine which has in it neither the shrill, hysterical note of mere excitement nor the hard, metallic twang of the cynic's sneer—which rings in the honest voice of gracious good-humor, which is innocent and unsatirical. Speech is genuine which is without silliness, affectation, or pretence. That character is genuine which seems built by nature rather than by convention, which is stuff of independence and of good courage. Nothing spurious, bastard, begotten out of true wedlock of the mind; nothing adulterated and seeming to be what it is not; nothing unreal can ever get place among the nobility of things genuine, natural, of pure stock and unmistakable lineage. It is a prerogative of every truly human being to come out from the low estate of those who are merely gregarious and of the herd, and show his innate powers cultivated and yet unspoiled—sound, unmixed, free from imitation; showing that individualization without extravagance, which is genuineness.

ENGLISH ODDITIES.

A Township Which Has Only One Resident.

Undoubtedly the most extraordinary township in England is that of Skiddaw, in Cumberland. It contains but one house, the occupier of which is unable to exercise the Briton's privilege of voting because there is no overseer to prepare a voters' list and no church or other place of worship or assembly on which to publish one, says Pearson's Weekly.

The most remote village in England is that of Farley-cum-Pitton. This truly rural spot is thirty miles and a half from the nearest railway station. As a contrast to this may be mentioned the hamlet of Ystrad, about ten miles from Cardiff. This tiny settlement possesses two important main roads, two railways and two large rivers.

A very unique feature is exclusively claimed by Trimley, a small village in Suffolk. In the one churchyard of the parish two churches are to be seen, service is conducted three times a week in each of these churches at the same hour.

The deepest well in England is found at Hamilton, in Hampshire. It stretches 350 feet below the surface of the earth. About half-way down this well shaft is a subway, three miles in length, which leads to the seacoast.

On the top of the parish church tower in Bicknoller, Somersetshire, is a yew tree, now five feet high, and still growing in a hardy fashion. It is generally believed that the tree owes its origin to a seed dropped by a bird.

Perhaps the most splendidly decorated church in the kingdom is that of Whitley Court, Worcestershire. It is entirely constructed of white marble, the pews are chastely carved and the pulpit is of genuine Carrara marble, richly paneled with precious stones.

On the village green at Meriden, in Warwickshire, there is a large stone cross, which is supposed to mark the central point of England.

Durability of Floors.

Some interesting tests of flooring materials recently made in Philadelphia are described in The Scientific American. The investigators used an ordinary iron rubbing wheel, such as is used by stone workers for rubbing a smooth face on marble or sandstone. The samples to be tested were cemented to the blocks of sandstone, and laid, face downward, on the rubbing wheel, which revolved at the rate of seventy-five revolutions a minute and was kept supplied with sharp sand and water. The blocks to BABY'S COMING.

Nature intended that every woman should look forward to the coming of her baby with joy and hope, unclouded by anxiety. Almost painless parturition is quite the usual thing among uncivilised people. Even in our own country it occasionally happens with women in robust health and good condition. It ought to be the rule instead of the exception; and it is a fact that a very large proportion of the usual pain and suffering may be avoided by looking after the mother's general health, and specially strengthening the particular organs concerned in parturition.

Many mothers have been brought through the trying time almost painlessly by the aid of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. It prepares the system for delivery by imparting the organic strength and elasticity which the mother specially needs; shortens the time of labor and of confinement; promotes the secretion of abundant nourishment for the child and fortifies the entire constitution against the after period of depression and weakness. It's use should begin in the early months of gestation—the earlier the better.

Mrs. Fred Hunt, of Glenville, Schenectady Co., N. Y., says: "I read about Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription being so good for a woman with child, so I got two bottles last September, and December 13th, I had a twelve-pound baby girl. When I was confined I was not sick in any way. I did not suffer any pain, and when the child was born I walked into another room and went to bed. I never had an after-pain or any other pain. This is the eighth child and the largest of them all. I suffered everything that flesh could suffer with the other babies. I always had a doctor and then he could not help me very much, but this time my mother and my husband were alone with me. My baby was only seven days old when I got up and dressed and left my room and stayed up all day."

Mrs Fred Hunt

the hair, become smaller, the hair roots are not properly nourished and the hair falls out. This also happens in fevers and disease. As a usual thing, after illness, these vessels soon regain their normal condition and the lost hair is quickly restored, but with age, restoring the hair is much more difficult. And if the hair follicles are entirely destroyed there is no remedy. The best agents for restoring the hair, especially where the person has been bald some time, is by massage or electricity. The first can be given by almost any barber, and I have known ladies who massaged their own heads successfully, but the second should only be given by or upon the direction of a physician. I have restored what at first appeared to be hopeless cases of almost total baldness of long standing by daily massage and the free use of lanoline and vaseline on the scalp. The tincture of cantharides, diluted to suit the condition of the individual scalp, is very useful when the loss of hair is due to inactivity of the circulation and the wasting of the glands and hair follicles.

"Now, dandruff is caused by the opposite condition of the scalp, or the over secretion by the glands. It is to the scalp what pimples are to the face. In these cases the hair follicles are clogged with too much grease, the simplest and most effective remedy being a thorough shampooing once a week and a daily massage of the scalp to aid the circulation. Washes containing alcohol, ammonia, borax and carbonate of potassium are good, but I have never had a case that would not yield to shampooing and massage.

"Some ladies have great faith in the old-fashioned idea of giving the hair one hundred strokes with the brush night and morning. I do not hesitate to tell them it is a fake. Many of them think my dislike of the brush a prejudice and pay little attention to my advice, but my dislike of the brush comes from more than twenty years' experience. The brush drags out the hair much more than the comb, and should be used as little as possible. A good healthy head of hair can be kept glossy as well without the brush as with it. All that is necessary is to keep it clean and well combed. Another fact about keeping the scalp and hair in perfect condition which many ladies disregard is that the hair should be allowed to fall loose over the shoulders whenever circumstances permit, and should never be confined at night or during the hours of repose."

Thin Folds and Ruffles.

"What a pity Miss So and So will wear so many ruffles on her gown," said would probably leave and coax Christine to give warning too!"

"Oh! I never thought of that."

"No, dear, they don't seem to teach girls how to be wives and housekeepers at Vassar. When I found that Fred hadn't returned yet I was awfully frightened. Nell and Tom brought me home, but they were so anxious to get off and begin to quarrel about the way she trumped his ace and how he frowned at her publicly for it that they slipped away as soon as my key turned in the lock. And there I was, alone in that big house at nearly 1 o'clock, and my lawful protector at his club playing poker!"

"It certainly was not a very pleasant experience."

"It was not at all pleasant, and I waited an hour and a half, getting madder all the time. The worst of it was that I knew he'd meet my reproaches with the story of the Minneapolis man and the promise of the new frock."

"Well, didn't you want a new——"

"My dear, I meant to get the frock, anyhow—a man can't let his wife wear rags. At 2:30 I heard him coming up the street with that horrid Mr. Wilde, and I just determined to give him a fright. I turned down the gas, and slipped into the little closet under the stairs where we keep the coats. Then I waited, with the door open about an inch, to hear what he would say when he found the house empty and the woman he had sworn to love and cherish probably robbed and murdered."

"Yes, and what did he do?" asked the teacher, breathlessly.

"He hunted all over the house, then went out and called to Mr. Wilde, who had stopped to light a cigar: 'I say, old man, I'm in luck; she isn't home yet! Let's go back to the club for an hour, and I'll tell her I got home at 11:30, and the house was so lonely without her that I went over to the Young Men's Christian Association to pass the time!' and then the two of them walked away down the street whistling 'Sweet Rosie O'Grady.'"

"Yes, but you had the comfort of telling him all about it at breakfast this morning," said the teacher, consolingly.

"Yes, I had—and that's why I am out shopping now," returned her friend, grimly.—Chicago Times-Herald.

A Pointer for Bicyclists.

To remove grease from saddle and bags make a solution of India rubber, by adding bisulphide of carbon to unvulcanized rubber, and letting the mixture stand about 24 hours. A quantity of the paste, when spread over grease spots on saddle leather, etc., and allowed to dry for two or three hours, can easily be stripped off, leaving the leather free from grease. The bisulphide of carbon does not injuriously affect the color of the leather.

Hair in Brushes

The brush trade is full of deception. An experienced hand will by touch tell if a broom or a brush be all hair or mixture. But if ever in doubt pull or cut off a suspicious hair and apply a match. However well doctored, the deception will be shown at once. Hairs will burn, rolling up ball-like, with the well-known smell of burned hair, while a vegetable substance will consume, leaving the charred portion like a burned match.

with a skirt of the same material, and long bands of cream guipure insertion let in at intervals in the body of the coat, which are lined with green silk. The collar has similar decorations, and in front is a lace jabot over green chiffon. There is a basque of long tabs, all finished with bands of lace insertion. The belt is of green lizard skin, with an old silver buckle in the Persian pattern. Lace insertion is extensively employed in various ways. It appears on skirts as well as on bodices, and on silk and woolen fabrics as well as on thin fabrics. When used on skirts the lace is let into the material in waved lines from hem to waist, or it is used as a heading to flounces. An attractive bodice decoration has the insertion used in lengthwise strips down the center of the blouse and a scroll pattern on each side of it. Insertions an inch wide are arranged in scrolls and bow knots and applied to muslins; lace braid used in the same manner is very effective. A pretty bodice of pink silk has a yoke striped with lace, and the sleeves are of lace and close fitting.

Parasols are more elaborate than they have been for many years, and special attention is given to their linings. The linings are often of chiffon, ruched, puffed or kilted and finished at the edge with lace frillings and flounces. A novel and charming hat is made of soft rose-colored tulle over a wire frame. The front and top of the hat is entirely covered with a large pink silk poppy. It is finished in the back by a large black velvet bow. Fair dames are already adding bright notes of color to their hats that hint that autumn is not far distant. It is naturally a bit early to mention the season of crimson and russet leaves, with a full month or more of warm weather yet to come, but there is a practical view to take of the matter. By this time the early summer hat has done good service, and its decorations are doubtless a little faded and worn. Large leghorn or cream straw hats that have been embellished with tulle and garlands of flowers can now be made to look very smart with a twist of black velvet about the crown, a smart bow at the side and a bunch of black plumes. Nothing looks worse than a mussy summer hat.

Among the elegant gems for dress occasions are those in princess style, open at the back and finished with Marguerite sleeves, and the bodice cut half low to admit of a pretty French chemisette of some rich material. Dainty gowns of white crepe de chine and of chiffon are tucked straight across the bodice, front and back and at intervals up the entire length of the sleeve, the tucks turning upward. The narrow girdle is trimmed with gold galloon, this garniture also finishing the flaring Medici collar, with plaited chiffon falling from it. The bodice fastens on the left shoulder and under the arm, leaving the tucks unbroken across the front. Many of the new tucked evening gowns of this material have rows of Valenciennes lace insertion on bodice and skirt. Accordion-plaited skirts of black silk grenadine, canvas, tulle, black muslin dotted in silk, and similar diaphanous fabrics are built over foundations of brilliant red and yellow silks and satins. Lace waists made with basque effect, both in black and white, become more popular as the season advances. Entire gowns of white lace are much in vogue. They are built of flounces of lace, sewed on sheer net, the flounces put on to overlap one another, so that only the lace is seen. Both wide and narrow lace is used. The bodices worn with the ruffled skirts are either entirely of lace or of bands of the insertion and net. A new model of crepe de chine, in a figured green and white pattern, has a yoke of lace at the top of the skirt, which fits perfectly over the hips, and there is a yoke on the bodice to match. Corselet lace pieces also adorn many of the new frocks. A black and white mull, worn at a dinner given at one of the country clubs this week, had a corselet of black French lace, which held the full blouse in place. The skirt was plain, except for a ruche of black lace at the hem. The sleeves were also of the black lace over white silk.

A recently imported frock in green cashmere velonte has a little blouse, cut in long points, trimmed with a pattern in black lace embroidery. The bodice and sleeves are of plaid silk in blues, greens and white. Another chic French costume is of white Swiss over a silk slip. The body is composed of inch wide yellow ribbon, with lace. The vest front is trimmed on each side with three full plaitings of the dotted Swiss, very wide at the top and covering the shoulder and most of the sleeve. The plaitings are finished just above the belt with rosettes of lilac velvet with jeweled buttons. The sleeves are made of ribbon and lace insertion, and finished at the wrist with a fall of lace. The belt and collar are of violet velvet. The skirt is built with a deep Spanish flounce of Swiss, with ribbon insertions, and a full ruching at the top of the flounce.

sharp sand and water. The blocks to which the floorings were cemented were of equal weight, so that the rubbing was effected under nearly the same pressure in all cases. Curiously enough, the material which resisted best this severest test was an india rubber tiling, which, after an hour's rubbing, lost only one sixty-fourth of an inch in thickness. Next to this, English encaustic tile gave the best results, losing only one-eighth of an inch in an hour's treatment. The artificial stone known as "granolithic" was third, losing three-eighths of an inch, while North River blue stone lost nine-sixteenths of an inch. A piece of marble mosaic disappeared entirely in thirty-five minutes, while solid white Vermont marble lost three-quarters of an inch in an hour's rubbing. Most of the wood floorings, indeed, resisted abrasion better than the marble. White pine, for example, lost only seven-sixteenths of an inch under treatment, which removed nearly twice as much from solid marble. Yellow pine showed substantially the same resistance as white pine, while oak lost more than either of the pines. It would seem as if the treatment with water was hardly fair to the wooden floorings, which depend a good deal on their elasticity for resisting wear, but even under such unfavorable circumstances they held their own remarkably.

Where Gold Has Been Found.

Gold exists in larger or smaller quantities in every portion of the world. It has been found in almost every state in the United States; in Devonshire, Cornwall, Wales and Scotland, in Great Britain; on the sands of the Rhine, the Reuss, the Rhone, and the Aar; at Salzburg, in the Tyrol, and at Zell; in the valleys of Toupa, Sesia, and Novara in Piedmont; at Percheria, in Lombardy on the Tagus, in Spain; in the rivers of Provence; in Southern and Eastern Siberia; in fourteen of the nineteen provinces of China; in the Island of Yesso, in Japan; in odd spots in India, Thibet, and the islands of Ceylon and Borneo; in Abyssinia, Kordofan, and the Soudan generally; in North Africa and the region watered by the Zambesi and Limpopo, in South Africa; in Australia, New Zealand and Canada. But, as a general rule, the precious metal is found in such small quantities that it will not pay to work the mines or placers. It is only now and then that it occurs in isolated localities in abundance.—Philadelphia Record.

CARE OF THE HAIR.

How One May Help to Prevent Baldness Timely Hints.

"What do you think of the theory advanced by some savant that man is tending to evolve into a hairless animal?" was asked of a hairdresser, whose specialty is diseases of the scalp, says The New York Sun.

"There is about as much probability of his walking on all fours," was the positive reply. "They know next to nothing about the hair and the scalp or they would never have such a thought. The hair never falls out unless there is something wrong about the scalp, caused by the general health, the habits of the individuals, or the way the scalp is treated. Blondes, of course, as a rule, have the thickest hair, as they average 790 hairs to the square inch, while there are 608 chestnut or brown hairs, 572 black hairs, and only 493 red hairs. I believe, as a rule, red-haired persons keep their hair the longest, while it turns gray sooner than any other. The hair is a good barometer of the health, for if a person is weak or ill, with an imperfect circulation, the hair invariably becomes thin, uneven and lacking in natural gloss. It is wonderful, with the constant falling out of the hair, that thin hair should not be more common, or that there is not more cases of total baldness. The average life of a hair is from two to six years.

"About the best way to keep the scalp healthy is to preserve its elasticity. To do this massage is necessary, and if there should not be enough oil, the hair feeling dry and brittle, a preparation containing lanoline, softened by the addition of either vaseline or glycerine, should be worked in with the fingers. If there is a tendency to baldness, this should be done daily. In such cases the application of water and too frequent shampooing should be avoided. The best hairdressers will all tell you that the hair should not be washed too frequently. The average person doesn't need to wash his hair oftener than once a month, but where the hair is excessively oily, which is really a good fault, it may be washed once every three weeks.

"As age comes on, the small vessels, wear so many ruffles on her gown," said an observing man of the world. "It accentuates the fact that she is rather thin, and her motive should be to bring out by graceful folds and softer trimmings those curves of the figure that are a woman's greatest attraction.

"Pray do not let her hear you," said a lady listening. "She imagines that she is so much thinner than she really is, and she spends all her allowance in the dainty edges that finish those countless ruffles. But I believe she ought to know the mistake she makes," continued the lady, "and I am going to tell her." At that moment the young lady in question joined the two people discussing her, and, as she seated herself, looked with pride at her muchly trimmed dress, that had ruffles from the waist line to the bottom of it, and was rather heavy, too, since there was exactly upon it fifty yards of white muslin ruffling.

Her expression somewhat changed, however, when her lady critic remarked: "We were just saying that you made a mistake by wearing so many ruffles; it produces an effect of angles instead of the curves that make natural and charming the feminine figure."

But," at once exclaimed the young woman, "I am so very thin, and these fluffy ruffles add to my size."

"There is where you are mistaken," replied the gentleman. "Many thin women make that mistake. You say you weigh a hundred and ten pounds, and your friend, Mrs. So and So, over there, only weighs a hundred pounds, yet she looks rounder than you do, and her gown is simply fashioned, but quite as dressy as yours with all its ruffles. She appreciates that the curves of her shoulders and the general outline of her figure are good and has her corsage so fashioned that none of this is distinguished."

The young woman by this time, scrutinizing herself in a long mirror and then glancing at the lady who wore but few ruffles, had to acknowledge that her critics observed what was true and reasonable. Her ruffles seemed to wilt as she realized their superfluity, but she was in a degree consoled when the gentleman in the party remarked: "It is a very erroneous idea for women to suppose that men do not admire thin women."

Your New Visiting Cards.

Styles in visiting cards and note paper might almost be said to change with the seasons. The latest card has not changed in size, but it is neither the very thick board of long ago nor the recent very thin material; it is of moderate thickness, and pure white. Block type is growing in popularity every day, and promises to oust the script, which has held its own so long. Script of a rather larger and heavier style is still good form. Addresses are put either in the lower left or lower right hand corner.

A Safeguard.

The farmer from Rockton was dilating on the wonders of Toronto to a number of admiring friends, and this was the conclusion of his monologue:

"And say! there's one great scheme they have in all the high-toned restaurants down in Toronto that I think is one of the best things that ever happened. When you go into a restaurant and set down to a table a waiter comes along and hands you a card that has printed on it the names of every dog-gonned thing, either of meat or drink, that they've got to sell in the place. And after the names of each thing they give you the price of what it will cost if you order it. At first I own I was rather mixed up, but after a little while I caught on, and understood why they give it to you. They give it so that you'll not run any risk of ordering anything that you can't pay for."

A Landmark Gone.

Reuben C. Hawley, after having attained the great age of 89 years, 7 months and 18 days, crossed the Great Divide on Saturday and another link which connected us with the early history of this county is broken. Deceased breathed his last at the old homestead, Fredericksburgh, and died with the full hope of a glorious resurrection He was one of the oldest residents of the county and a man of sterling worth. He was greatly esteemed and respected by his large circle of friends and acquaintances, who will regret to learn that the kindly old man is no more. Mr. Hawley was a staunch Reformer and at the last general election was at hand to mark his ballot for the cause of Liberalism which he had so much at heart. He leaves three daughters, Mrs. G. H. Williams, of Napanee, Mrs. Lasher, of Toronto, and Mrs. Bogart, of Deseronto, and one son, R. G. Hawley, on the old homestead, to mourn. The funeral took place on Sunday, a large concourse of people following his remains to their last resting place.

The Bank Robbery.

There has been no new developments in the Dominion Bank robbery but the detectives in charge are still devoting the greater part of their time to Napanee. Mr. Dorothy, of the Pinkerton force, has been in town this week assisting Mr. Wilks and Detective Greer, of Toronto, is also here camping on the trail of the robbers. A great many people have been interrogated by the detectives, who are quietly following up a clue that may lead to interesting developments in a few days. The theory advanced by THE EXPRESS last week that the four men who were camped at Hawley's Point are the artists who did the work is generally accepted. A citizen who was up at the midnight train on the night of the robbery, to meet his wife, undoubtedly had a look at two of the men connected with the robbery. While returning home he noticed two men near the post-office muffled up in heavy overcoats. He describes them as a tall and a short man. It struck him as strange that they should be so muffled up on such a warm night.

An Error of Judgment

During the progress of the fair on Tuesday a number of people were relieved of their pocketbooks and watches by adroit and practised pick pockets. After the show it came to the ears of High County Constable Sills that a couple of men had visited several stores in town and attempted to work the old flim-flam game, or change racket. The mode of procedure is to make a small purchase, tender a $10 bill in payment and then attempt to confuse the merchant while making the change. Constable Sills spotted his men and quietly shadowed them. After he had convinced himself that they were the parties in question he secured the assistance of Geo S. Hinch and arrested them. They proved to be Horace Staley, 222 Sydenham street, Kingston, Jas. Williams, 313 Notre Dame street, Montreal, and Jas. Huffman, 1000 House, Kingston. Staley had $68.25 and two gold watches on his person when arrested, Huffman $18.40 and a watch, and Williams $50.65 and a gold watch. A set of loaded dice and other devices pertaining to the gambling profession were found on the trio.

Huffman proved to be the young man who was operating a pinch wheel of fortune on the fair grounds on Tuesday afternoon until he was stopped by the police. The other two were identified with him in operating the affair.

The three men were kept in custody until Wednesday morning when they were brought before Police Magistrate Daly, who remanded them to gaol for eight days to allow of evidence being procured against them. While in court Staley and Williams were identified by Mr. T. S. Henry, Mr. Taylor, of Taylor & Morris, and Mr. Geo. Maybee as the two men who had visited their respective places of business and and attempted to work the "flim flam" game. The magistrate consented to give the prisoners their liberty providing they deposit $100 each as a guarantee for their appearance on the day of trial. This they were unable to do. On Wednesday evening the prisoners were again summoned before Mr. Daly. Mr. Herrington appeared for the crown and Mr. Deroche defended the prisoners. The charge preferred against the men was that of vagrancy but it was the intention of the protecutor to lay other charges against them as soon as the evidence was collected.

When the prisoners were brought before the magistrate Mr. Herrington asked that they be arraigned, explaining that if they entered a plea of "not guilty" he would ask that they be remanded until Thursday or Friday. Mr. Deroche contended that no evidence had been adduced against the men and it was unfair to keep them in custody. Mr. Herrington pointed out that it was no part of his duty to disclose evidence until the prisoners had been arraigned and pleaded not guilty to the charge. The magistrate then administered a severe lecture to the three men and forthwith discharged them.

The general concensus of opinion is that the Magistrate made a grave error when he allowed the men their freedom when there was such strong presumtive evidence of their guilt. We hear murmurings on every hand and much indignation is expressed that the fakers have been allowed to go unwhipped of justice. On Thursday morning an EXPRESS representative decided to interview Mr. Daly and learn his reason for the course adopted. Mr. Daly said that he had kept the men in custody for twenty four hours, during which time he had telephoned to Yarker, Moscow and other places in the hope of locating some of the parties who it was reported had their pockets picked. Failing to secure any evidence against them he had discharged them. He had given them a strong lecture and as he had allowed them to go without imposing any fine or costs he believed it would do them some good. Had he assessed them, they would probably have said, "Well he gave us good advice, but he charged us d——well for it." What the constables had secured for their services he didn't know. That was their business. Mr. Daly said there was no doubt the men had attempted to work the flim flam game, but an attempt to steal did not constitute an indictable offence. He censured the Mayor for granting license to the electric belt man, who had fleeced the public. He said that members of the town council should exercise care in granting licenses to men for the purpose of running questionable games. If the people who had been robbed had co operated with the authorities and reported their losses it would greatly aid the ends of justice.

We took the trouble to refer to the criminal code and find that Mr. Daly is wrong in stating that an attempt to

The case of Everett Williams, who was acquitted on a charge of manslaughter at the last assizes, may be re opened. It appears that on the motion of the Crown a case was reserved for argument as to whether certain depositions made by Williams before the coroner's jury had been properly rejected by the judge. The matter was brought up at Toronto last week but as Williams was not represented by counsel, the court made an order permitting the Crown to serve him and to institute a new trial in case it should be decided that the evidence in question had been improperly thrown out.

Death of Wm. H. Perry.

Another of the pioneers of this county passed over to his reward on Monday in the person of Mr William H. Perry, aged 86 years, 10 months and 10 days. Deceased left his farm at Violet about a year ago and took up his residence with his son, J. Rudd Perry, John St., at whose home he breathed his last, surrounded by all the comforts that loving care could provide. Deceased sustained a bad fall about a month ago from the effects of which he never fully recovered. Mr. Perry had been a conspicuous figure in this county for years and was universally esteemed for his many sterling qualities. He was prominently indentified with the Methodist church and noted for probity, industry, and integrity. Deceased was twice married, his second wife surviving him. Two of his children, Mrs. Madden, and Edwin preceded him to the grave about a year ago. The surviving members of the family are:—Mrs. W. A. Rockwell, Mrs. Fraser, Mrs. Davy, J. Rudd Perry and Major A. B. Perry, of the Northwest Mounted Police. Major Perry, who has just returned from attending the Queen's Jubilee, lies critically ill at the home of his wife's relatives at Lachute, Que., and was thus unable to attend the funeral, which took place to the Napanee cemetery and was very largely attended.

Run Down by a Train.

Sunday morning at 8:30 o'clock, Emma Hartman, aged 40 years, a woman who was slightly demented, was struck by an east-bound freight train about half a mile west of Collin's Bay station, and instantly killed. The deceased resided on her brother's farm, about two miles south of Odessa. On Saturday afternoon, about 5 o'clock, she wandered away from home. Knowing that her mind was unbalanced, and fearing that she might get into mischief, Mr. Hartman and a number of neighbors started to search for her. Late at night they located her in a cedar bush. She answered their calls, but managed to keep her distance from them. Failing to get hold of the woman, the search was given up and the party returned home to wait for daylight. Sunday morning, bright and early, Mr. Alfred Hartman started out to renew the search for his sister. He heard she had been seen on the railway track, in the vicinity of Colin's Bay, and thither he started as fast as his speedy horse could carry him. He arrived at Collin's Bay, fifteen minutes too late to save his sister from an awful death.

Miss Hartman proceeded along the track east till she had nearly reached the station, when the section-man's dog ran out and she turned back. She then proceeded to walk westward along the southern track. A heavy fraight train from the West came thunderin; down the grad., but, instead of stepping to one side and clearing the approaching danger, she calmly stood on the track and waved a small stick she had in her hand at it. At first Engineer Davis thought the woman would get off the track, so he merely sounded a warning whistle; when this failed to arouse her, he reversed his lever and sounded "down brakes." But the efforts of the engine-drive and the brakeman were of no avail: the train sped on and the cow-catcher hurried the woman high in the air, landing her in a ditch on the side of the track. The train was heavily laden and reached Colin's Bay station before it could be brought to a standstill. A second train, from the East, arrived at Collin's Bay and the engine was detached and proceeded to the scene of the accident. When the train-hands reached the place, they found Miss Hartman quite dead. Her back was broken, several ribs fractured, her right eye bruised, and her left leg badly bruised. She was dressed in a wrapper, without hat, shoes or stockings, and when she was found she was almost entirely naked. As soon as the deceased's brother arrived, he gave the train-hands charge of her body, while he went to notify his friends. Dr. Mundell was called, but, on hearing the train-hand's story, he decided that an inquest was unnecessary.

The deceased was a splendid-looking woman, about 5 feet 9 inches high, weighing about 170 lbs. Her brother says she was bright, cheerful and contented. At times she wandered away from home, but, when taken back seemed to be happy. Her father dropped dead only a week ago.

The Passing of Mrs. Orr.

The somewhat noted old lady, Doctress Orr, died at the House of Industry, Kingston, on Wednesday, at the age of 112 years. She was born in mid ocean on the 8th of May, 1785. Mrs. Orr resided for many years in Fredericksburgh, and was well-known in Napanee. She was acquainted with the medicinal virtues of many roots and herbs and made a respectable living as a professor of the healing art, until through failing health and infirmity she became reduced in circumstances and was forced to find a home in the House of Refuge where she has been for the last thirteen years. About three years ago the Doctress created considerable excitement by giving out that she was the possessor of untold wealth, both in money and land. All of this enormous wealth she willed to Mr. J. J. Perry, druggist of Napanee, for whom she had a deep regard. Unfortunately for Mr. Perry the wealth existed only in the old lady's imagination. The town council of Napanee have sent word to Kingston that Mrs. Orr be given a respectable burial at their expense.

Public Temperance Meeting.

On Friday evening, Sept. 17th, a grand public temperance meeting was held in Finkle's Hall, Newburgh, in connection with the meeting of the District Division of the Sons of Temperance, of the counties of Lennox and Addington, which was held in Percy's Hall during the day. Mr. Alex. Karr, of Napanee, was called to the chair. Short addresses were delivered by D. A. Nesbitt, Principal of Newburgh High School, Revs. W. B. Seccombe, of Odessa, C. L. Thompson and J. G. Gandier, of Newburgh, also by Mr. Arnott, of Napanee, and A. D. Weeks, Grand Treasurer of the order, who was present as the representative of Grand Division of Ontario. All the addresses were interesting and to the point, many good things being said that were thoroughly appreciated, Rev. C. L. Thompson alone being somewhat, as he termed it, pessimistic in his views, but then he admitted at the onset that he was sick, which partly accounted for his being somewhat faint-hearted. Mr. F. Tooker, rendered, in his usual good style, a very appropriate recitation, "The Face upon the Floor." The whole programme was interspersed with vocal and instrumental music. A trio by Misses Watts and Clark and Dr. Metzler, of Odessa, entitled "Down in the Licensed Saloon," was well received as was also a solo and chorus by Miss Watts and others. A mouth-organ duett by Miss Wagar, of Napanee, and Mr. J. Whalen, of Newburgh, with Miss Edna Glenn at the piano, was much enjoyed by all. A quartette by Misses Baughan and Glenn and Messrs. Matheson and Shorey and a duett by Messrs. Shorey and Moore also formed part of the evenings entertainment. During the progress of the programme a strong resolution, bearing on the plebiscite and prohibition generally, was submitted to the meeting and almost unanimously endorsed by the largest temperance meeting ever held in Newburgh, the hall being packed to the doors, many finding only standing room. The Sons of Temperance are making a strong effort to lay the matter of temperance legislation before the people and deserve the support of all those who have the cause at heart. A full report of the proceedings of the District Division will be published in local papers next week and will be the official report to the Divisions in the Counties of Lennox and Addington.

We understand it was the intention to charge young Huffman with running a gambling outfit. The penalty for this offence is 3 years imprisonment or a fine not to exceed $2,000.

We honestly believe that the three men in question form part of an organized gang of crooks, whose headquarters is Kingston. Had the police magistrate remanded them for a few days sufficient evidence would have been forthcoming to convict them on a charge of pick pocketing. High County Constable Sills feels very much chagrined over the outcome of the case. Rightly or wrongly he feels that the police magistrate is hostile to him and will nullify anything he may do. He is thinking seriously if resigning his position as under the circumstances it is of no more value to the administration of justice than that of the ordinary constable, Mr. Sills referred to the case of the two tramps whom he arrested and brought before Mr. Daly. These tramps had a burglar's outfit in their possession. The magistrate gave them one hour in which to leave town.

Michael Dolan had Wm. Doran before police magistrate Daly on Wednesday on a charge of horse stealing. It appears that Doran lived with Dolan up to a short time ago when they had a misunderstanding and Doran left. Doran claimed that he had a lien of $46 on the horse and failing to secure his money he quietly entered the pasture field one night and took the horse. Hence the action. The magistrate ordered Doran to return the horse—Dolan to pay costs in the action.

The little four year old daughter of a prominent citizen gave evidence on a recent Sunday that she is a good financier. She accompanied her mother to church and had been given a copper to put in the contribution plate. During the offertory she induced her mother to trade the five cents she intended placing in the plate for her copper. When the plate passed before her the little tot quietly placed her hands behind her back and neglected to place the nickle in the plate. Next day she paid a visit to a confectionary shop and invested her savings.

RELATION OF FOOD AND CARE TO FUTURE USEFULNESS.

The Essence of Wisdom, Says Hoard's Dairyman, That Comes From Experience and Observation—An Article That Will Pay Dairymen to Ponder Over.

It is a sad fact that of the noted cows with phenomenal records, scarcely one has left a descendant anywhere near as good as herself. Of course, we should not expect that every calf of these cows, or in fact, that every calf of any good cow should be better than the dam; but some of them ought to be. If all cows have descended from a common ancestry, some very powerful influence has been at work to produce such marked variations. In one breed the whole energy of the food goes to the production of beef; in another, to the production of milk rich in butter fat; in still another, to large flow of milk, with a lower percentage of fat. The factors that have made such wide and wonderful variations in breeds are not accidental, but fixed and certain, and by understanding them and continuing to use them the stock breeder has it within his power to make such further developments in any of these lines as shall throw deeply in the shade all that has been done. And invariable rule is, that when any animal man is no exception has its food and environments changed, a change at once begins in the characteristics of the animal. Upward with better food and care, and downward under adversity. That men show these wide variations, due to food and care, can be seen by comparing a nation of nitrogen eaters, like the Scotch, with the little pot-bellied, blubber-eating Esquimalt. As marked a variation, due entirely to difference in food and care, is seen by comparing a Clydesdale horse with a Shetland pony. There is no more important field of investigation and study for the dairyman than the variations of animals due to changes of food and care. That the two great classes of cattle, the beef producers and the dairy or milk producers, have resulted from systems of feeding as greatly varied as the characteristics of the classes, needs no proof, and what the dairymen should know is what class of foods and what systems of feeding and care will increase the variations in the animals.

What he wants is a cow at maturity; not one that will get fat the moment its food is increased, but one that is capable of eating a large quantity of food, and put the energy derived therefrom in the milkpail. Not the cow that will give the most milk from the best food is the best one, but the cow capable of eating the most food and making milk in proportion to the food eaten. A cow that will eat 10 cents worth of food and give 15 cents worth of milk is not nearly as desirable as one that will eat 20 cents worth of food and yield 30 cents in milk. It will take just as much time to care for her, and she will occupy as much room in the stable, and while giving the same per cent. of profit, the aggregate will be only half as much. What is wanted, then, is a large eater, with good digestion, and then to know how to feed for best results. To get this kind of a cow the dairyman must commence with the calf; not at its birth, but at the beginning of its foetal existence. By stuffing the dam all this time on all the fat eating foods she can eat, thus making her fat, the calf will be dwarfed in frame and be born little and fat, and no subsequent system of feeding can ever undo the injury. The dam during this period should have plenty of coarse food, containing an abundance of bone material; should be kept strong and healthy, but never fat, and if giving milk, all the better, even if properly fed, up to the period of the birth of the youngster. If after birth it be allowed to suck its mother for any length of time, the tendency will be to fatten it, and if this be allowed until it is "fit for veal," it will be injured, more or less, and no system of feeding can ever remedy the mistake.

Doubtless, one reason why so many noted cows have such offspring is that the owners are so very anxious to "do well" for the future cow, they ruin them by injudicious feeding while in embryo, or during its first year of life. The whole system of feeding should, from the start, be with a view of making a large eater of such foods as will make a strong frame, and give capacity to eat and digest still more food, of the milk-producing kinds; consequently the cow should never have fattening foods, but rather that which is coarse and bulky, with just enough nutriment to keep the calf making growth and muscular development. There is no better food for the calf that sweet skim milk, but this should, for the first few weeks, be fed warm, as warm as it comes from the cow, and as soon as old enough to eat grain, a little flax seed should be added to the milk, and a little oil meal, and a little bran, and a little of the best hay, cut fine, and mixed with the grain. Feed for growth, for muscle and bone material, more bone material than any other food, but the calf should not have too much of this either.

Remember, always, that it is not fat that is wanted, but an immense storage with the ability to digest and assimilate what is eaten. Early cut, bright, barn housed straw of any kind is good food, and when within reach, the calf will find a good deal of amusement "picking it between meals," and if fed plenty of bran and succulent food, it will greedily eat a large quantity, and this will help to distend the stomach and increase storage capacity. We hear a good deal about the value of a long, slim tail as indicative of the good qualities of a cow, but I don't believe it pays to let the calf run out and fight flies the first summer for the sake of tail development. Calf meat is mighty expensive fly food, and when out in the hot sun with "millions" of flies pumping away at its life blood, it can't eat food enough to grow. It is far better to keep the youngster in a cool, airy, moderately lighted room with flies "screened" out for the first summer, and supply the proper food for its growth, even if its tail don't get as long by half an inch. Remember, then, once more, that your whole aim should be to give your calf a strong frame, big belly, and go immense power to eat and digest milk producing foods, and put the product into the milkpail; and from its conception until a mature cow, the whole line of food selection and feeding should be with this end in view. J. S. Woodward, in Practical Farmer.

Temperature of Food.

The temperature of the things we eat and drink is hardly ever noticed; still, it is of considerable importance that food or drink should be of the right temperature. For healthy people hot articles of food should be served at a temperature about half that of the blood, but for infants it is imperative that milk should be given at blood-heat. Drinks intended to quench thirst are about right at a temperature of from 50 to 70 degrees Fahrenheit. Drink or food at extremely high or extremely low temperatures may do damage, and are most harmful when swallowed rapidly. Drinking water is best taken at 55 degrees, geltzers and soda water should be slightly warmed and beer should not be cooled to more than 60 degrees; red wine is best at 65 degrees; white wine at 50; champagne is the one liquor which is best at the lowest temperature allowed, but should not be taken colder than 45 degrees. Coffee and tea should not be taken hotter than from 105 to 120 degrees; milk is considered cold at 60 degrees, when it will be found to have the best aroma.

Cure for Hydrophobia.

There is a very simple method of curing hydrophobia and that form of epilepsy which is so frequently mistaken for it, which cure is known as the Buisson treatment, and is effected by forcing the poison through the pores of the skin by profuse perspiration. In cases where convulsions have already taken place, says a correspondent of The Boston Transcript, the patient should enter a vapor bath, with temperature from 127 degrees to 140 degrees Fahrenheit, and remain there until all symptoms of hydrophobia have disappeared. Where these baths are used as a preventive, one should be taken on each of seven consecutive days. This remedy is so simple that if no Russian or Turkish bath can be had it is quite possible to gain the desired result in any room by excluding the air as much as possible, placing patient in a chair over a lighted oil stove, on which is a pan of hot water, and, having wrapped all in blankets, allowing the patient to sweat out the poison.

Sunstroke.

A new theory of sun-stroke has recently been expounded and is of particular interest at this season, when the source of the world's heat is getting in its hottest work. This theory is that what is called sunstroke is in fact the creation within the blood of the victim of a specific poison that acts upon the nerve centres or ganglia and so affects the brain and the other organs of the body and often causes death. The poison is created by a sort of chemical reaction and is thought to be made possible by certain conditions of the kidneys. The intense heat is, of course, the prime cause of the reaction, and is aided by injudicious use of foods and drinks. The next effort will be to secure, if possible, a sample of the poison element itself in order to analyse it, and perhaps to find an antidote. The recent remedies for sunstroke are practically confined to efforts to reduce the temperature of the body of the victim.—Washington Star.

PROPER DRESS FOR THE NECK.

Ties and Stocks Are of Gorgeous Hues For Early Autumn.

The stylish ties for next season are the butterfly bow, the accordion-plaited bow, and the Napoleon stock. In color these ties are gorgeous. Plaids, it is believed, will be the most popular, even more so than the Roman stripes, which are somewhat newer.

The butterfly bow tie has a most unusual appearance when untied, and to the uninitiated it appears less like a tie than almost anything else one could imagine. In reality it is nothing more or less than a wide string tie with broad ends so notched as to, when tied, give the fluffy effect of a narrow Windsor. It possesses one very great advantage to feminine minds, it is so easily tied correctly. In fact it would be next to impossible to tie it any other way. The most stylish are in dark plaids and Roman stripes in any and all colors. They should be selected to contrast and not match the waists with which they are to be worn.

The accordion-plaited bow is a made-up tie, two full accordion-plaited ends fastened to a plain band by a puffy little knot in the centre. These come in all solid colored and figured silks and in black satin. The newest, and perhaps the most stylish, are of shaded silk, the outer edge of the bow being brighter than the centre and the band on which it is made. One pretty tie of this description had ends of rose cerise shaded to black, and fastened to its black band with a soft cerise knot.

The Napoleon stocks will be much affected by women with long necks. They are broad bands, fitted closely to the neck, with Windsor ends of bias silk fastened in the back. One of these ends is so arranged as to slip the other through it; then they are both brought forward and tied in a soft, fluffy bow under the chin. These ties may be worn with or without a collar, and on dressy occasions may show a full of narrow lace around the throat. So far, these ties are only shown in gay colors, either plaids or pronounced figures, but they may be had in either silk or cotton. The latter are for bicyclists, and should be worn only with cotton or linen waists. The narrow stocks of last season, fastening in the back, and with a stiff made bow, come this season only in black satin, to be worn with turn-over collars.

Something entirely new and for evening wear is the floral boa. It is a thick garland of bright colored flowers, to be worn close around the neck, with ends of broad taffeta ribbon. These are especially designed to take the place of the ostrich boa for evening wear in the early fall before one feels the need of furs. They are much cheaper than ostrich boas, and, as they are generally becoming, will doubtless be much worn. A striking one, and becoming to a brunette, is of large, yellow chrysanthemums; there were three rows of blossoms and twelve in a row, with four broad streamers of yellow taffeta ribbon. On the ends of each of these ribbons was fastened a chrysanthemum, giving the effect of large, fluffy tassels.

New Trimmings For Fall Gowns.

All the gowns are to be trimmed this season, the skirts as well as the bodices. Yokes are to be much in favor and every yoke requires a certain amount of trimming as its finish.

A great quantity of braid will be used. Black braid in all widths will be fashionable—the braid will trim the dresses rather in a design than in straight rows—skirts will be braided not only near the hem but from the waist line down over the upper part of the skirt.

Puckered satin ribbon will be perhaps the newest trimming of the season. It will be wrought in many different designs and frequently edged with a fine silk cord. Conventinal scrolls will be one of the favorite designs for trimming skirts.

Pipings of satin or velvet will also be much in favor. Many of the newest sleeves will be trimmed from the cuff to near the shoulder with parallel rows of piping. This makes a particularly effective trimming, especially when the piping is a shade or two darker than the material of the dress. It will also be fashionable to have the piping in conspicuous color contrast from the dress.

Silk applique trimmings will be much in demand. For street gowns black will be the favorite, but on reception and dancing gowns all the delicate colors will be used. These applique trimmings are very beautiful in floral designs and wrought with tiny bits of colored rhinestones.

Passementerie will claim its customary popularity. It is always in demand, and this season's designs are more intricate and striking than ever before. Two-toned silk passementerie will also be in fashion. Passementeries wrought with jet will be worn, and Vandyke point effects will be much in favor.

The old-time cording is coming back into fashion again. The cordings are always in striking contrast to the color of the dress they trim.

Tucks as a trimming are to be all the vogue. Very fine tucks will be used, and they will trim not only the sleeves of the new gown, but the skirts.

The Fashion in Portieres.

The newest portieres for the coming season banish the old-time superstition that bad luck follows the peacock. This proud, gayly colored bird appears to be the most popular design for fall, both on the heavy and thin hangings. The latest Liberty velvets, which are so satisfactory as portieres, are stamped with small peacocks. In some of the Liberty velvets the peacock is seen in all the glory of its natural colors, and then again it apears in colors of which the real bird never dreamed.

The peacock is also conspicuous on the newest gauze silk curtains.

In addition to the Liberty velvet portieres there is a very effective new material for hangings called Oxford velvet. This has a smooth, shaded appearance and comes in delft blue and white, in two shades of olive, in dull red and cream color and in a variety of other tints.

The shadow tapestry is one of the novelties of the fall season. It is expensive, but is exquisite in its changing tints.

The tapestry with a Pompadour stripe is another novelty. One particularly effective pattern shows the figured background in old lavender, and the stripes in a soft cream color.

An inexpensive material for hangings, which always looks well, is called Singapore lattice. It is an open work woven cord fabric and costs but 50 cents a yard and is fifty inches wide. It can be bought in all the new popular shades. The most fashionable sash curtains are made of Calcutta net in either ecru or pure white. This material looks like a fairly coarse net, and is finished with a Louis XVI. edge.

The casement muslins in various designs will also be used for sash curtains.

For bedrooms the gossamer prints will be much used. This material makes an exceptionally dainty curtain. It is sheer in quality and has a colored stamped design.

After a Severe Cold. "Hood's Sarsaparilla has cured me of scrofula. I was weak and debilitated and Hood's Sarsaparilla built me up and made me strong and well. After a severe cold I had catarrhal fever, I again resorted to Hood's Sarsaparilla which accomplished a complete cure." SARAH E. DEVAY, Annapolis, Nova Scotia.

The agent representing the Payne Medicine Company who has visited every house in town and left a circular referring to their medicines, is carrying with him a volume of testimonials, which go to show some wonderful cures attributed to Payne's Silver Pills and Payne's Pain Reliever. Their medicines will be on sale at all the principal places.

By advertisement in another column of this paper it will be noticed that Messrs. T. G. Davis and Robert Ford (late of Roblin & Ford) have received their fall stock of English and Canadian suitings and overcoatings. The stock, we have been informed, has been bought for "spot cash" and as their expenses are reduced to the minimum they are enabled to sell at bottom prices. We are informed that where parties require it, they can purchase cloth and trimmings and have them cut by Mr. Ford or have them made up on the premises at the option of the purchaser. I is needless to say that Mr. Ford's reputation as cutter has long been established in this town, he having been cutter formerly for Davis Bros. some years ago and more lately in business for himself under the name of Roblin & Ford, having a large ordered clothing trade. Intending purchasers would do well to give them a call before purchasing. Their premises are located in the second flat of the Coates Block, south side of Dundas Street, over Fennell's hardware store.

CAUSE AND EFFECT.

The Relations of the Fleecy Milkweed and the Busy Bee.

Two months hence an occasional silky messenger will float away from the glistening clouds about the open milkweed pods, but who ever thanks the bees of June for them? The flower is but a bright anticipation—an expression of hope in the being of the parent plant. It has but one mission. All its fragrance, all its nectar, all its beauty of form and hue, are but means toward the consummation of the eternal edict of creation—"Increase and multiply." To that end we owe all the infinite forms, designs, tints, decorations, perfumes, mechanisms and other seemingly inexplicable attributes. Its threshold must bear its own peculiar welcome to its insect, or perhaps to its humming-bird friend, or counterpart; its nectaries must both tempt and reward his coming, and its petals assist his comfortable tarrying.

Next to the floral orchids, the mechanism of our milkweed blossom is perhaps the most complex and remarkable, and illustrates as perfectly as any of the orchid examples given in Darwin's noble work the absolute divine intention of the dependence of a plant species upon the visits of an insect.

Our milkweed flower is a deeply planned contrivance to insure such an end. It fills the air with enticing fragrance. Its nectaries are stored with sweets, and I fancy each opening bud keenly alert with conscious solicitude for its affinity. Though many other flowers manage imperfectly to perpetuate their kind in the default of insect intervention, the milkweed, like most of the orchids, is helpless and incapable of such resource. Inclose this budded umbel in tarlatan gauze, and it will bloom days after its fellow-blooms have fallen, anticipating its consummation, but no pods will be seen upon this cluster.—William Hamilton Gibson.

Electricity From Street Dirt.

An economic and scientific experiment began in London when Lord Kelvin opened at Shoreditch the combined electricity and dust destruction works erected at a cost of about $750,000. The destructor cells are capable of burning 20,000 tons of ashbin refuse yearly, and the heat given out is sufficient for the electric light and power of the whole of Shoreditch, with a population of 124,000 besides supplying heat to the adjoining bath and wash houses.

In Paris lamps will be lighted for the first time on Monday by electricity furnished by a destructor.

The unique municipal enterprise is exciting the liveliest interest in scientific and municipal circles in Great Britain and abroad. If successful, it promises to revolutionize the public supply of electricity, as the vestry of Shoreditch promises to supply electricity at twopence (4 cents) per unit in the day time and at fourpence (8 cents) per unit at nighttime.

During a preliminary test 150 pounds pressure of steam was raised in the boilers from dust alone, absolutely no coal being used.—Industrial World.

Paper Piping.

The experiments being conducted in land with pipes made of paper are attracting universal attention. The material used is cellulose paper, soaked in asphalt. The pipes are said to be impermeable, capable of resisting heavy pressure, not subject to the ordinary deterioration, and not affected by the action of electric currents. If the continued use shall confirm the expectations warranted by the practical tests, it is probable that the underground pipe making industry will be revolutionized, providing the cost of manufacture does not forbid a market. No thoroughly effective remedy for rust and wear, caused by ground electric wires, has been discovered, unless, indeed, this may prove the one, and a relief from these evils will be eagerly embraced, even if a radical change in construction and material of the piping is necessary.

The Brain of a Clam.

It is only within a comparatively short time that the existence of an organ properly termed a brain in the lowest orders of animals has been recognized. Of course, very far down in the scale of creation one finds hardly more than a system of nerves and ganglia, with nothing especially recognized as representing a brain. But even a clam may be said to have a sort of brain, though it is extremely small; it can be dissected and properly identified as the thinking centre or principal ganglion of the creature. This principal nerve bunch or ganglion has direct control over the so-called "foot" of the clam. When it comes to the higher mollusks, such as the squid, nautilus, argonaut and other cephalopods, it is found that they possess quite large and well developed brains.

Strange Things Pneumatic

This is the age of things pneumatic. A St. Louis man has invented a rubber cloak which can be transformed into a mattrass by blowing it up. Everything is blown up nowadays. A patent has been granted a kind of cap which, being blown up, may be made to serve as a pillow at night or as a life preserver in case of shipwreck. This is a most convenient thing to travel with on the ocean. There is also a life preserving corset. Better than any of these, however, is a peculiarly buoyant fabric devised by a German. It is interwoven with the quills of geese or other birds and is intended for wearing apparel or for linings. So light is it that a person on a voyage, if clad in a suit of it, may be sure of floating in case of disaster of falling overboard.

The Greatest Diving Feat.

The greatest diving feat ever attempted was that of the raising of treasure that sunk with a steamer near Seal Rocks, New South Wales. News has been received here that every box of sovereigns that went to the bottom has been saved by the men who worked under the sea at a depth of 27 fathoms. The names of the divers are Briggs and May. At times they were subject to a pressure of 70 to 75 pounds to the square inch, causing them great suffering. The Catterthun was wrecked in April, 1895, while on the voyage from Sydney to Hong Kong. Fifty-four of her crew and passengers lost their lives, including brave Captain Shannon. The vessel's cargo consisted of produce and £10,000 in sovereigns.—San Francisco Examiner.

Of Course, He Was Not.

Mrs. Wellmont—"Are you married?"
Weary Willie (indignantly)—"Wot! D'ye t'ink I'd be relyin' on totalstrangers for support if I had a wife?"—Judge.

Straw Hat Possibilities.

Very elegant wall pockets are made of old hats. Indeed, the possibilities of old or new straw hats are endless. You take a roughly braided ba thing hat which you wore last summer at the beach, line it with azure-satin, twist it to any graceful shape you please, on the upper surface of the flaring brim paint or embroider a group of flowers, and to the lower attach a large bow of ribbon with broad loops, and you have an ornament which sets off the wall splendidly. The deep crown forms the pocket, and the brim makes the picturesque part, and you would hardly suppose that with so little you could do so much toward the brightening of a dull room. Father's summer straw hat (which you hid away in the attic, so that he should be compelled to buy a new one) will lend itself to your ideas of the beautiful very readily. Line it with crimson flannel, fasten a cluster of wheat, a bunch of summer grasses, or a few spears of oats to one side, and tack one bit of the brim down with a bow, and there you are with the scrap basket, which is just what you need in the sitting room or library.

Mr. Green says that he only tried them out of curiosity, but it was a lucky experiment, for Doan's Pills made a complete cure in his case. He is now a cured man, feeling strong, well and in good spirits.

EXCELSIOR.

A Manufacture of Wood That Has Many Uses.

The material known as excelsior is not refuse, nor is it made of shavings; it is an article of regular manufacture. Excelsior is of invention, and it was first made in the United States, says The New York Sun, thirty-five or forty years ago, the present output amounts to thousands of tons annually, and the use of it is all the time increasing.

Excelsior is made in many parts of the country, almost always in mills that are in close proximity to the forests from which the supplies of wood are taken. A considerable amount of excelsior is made in conjunction with other manufactures; for example, it is not unusual to set up a few excelsior machines in a lumber mill. There is, however, at least one concern in the United States that makes nothing but excelsior, and has, at a number of different points, mills devoted solely to the production of these curling fibres of wood.

Basswood and poplar are the woods used in the production. The logs are sawed into lengths of eighteen inches, which is the length of a fibre of excelsior. These blocks are split into halves and the wood is properly seasoned. Excelsior is made of different degrees of coarseness and fineness of fibre. In the manufacture a series of knife points run down the face of the block cutting into the wood in parallel lines that are spaced according to the width of the fibre to be made. A following knife slices off the whole face of the block thus scored. The fibres curl and commingle as the knife sets them free. An excelsior machine makes 200 to 300 strokes a minute, every stroke cutting off a tier of fibres across the face of the block. The usual commercial package of excelsior is a bale weighing about 250 pounds. At wholesale excelsior sells at $16 to $40 a ton.

Excelsior is extensively used for packing purposes, and in the manufacture of bedding and various other upholstery uses. It is also largely used for filtering purposes, and it has various other uses. Excelsior is now manufactured in Germany and France, where it is called wool wood. The wood used in the manufacture in those countries is brought from Norway and Sweden, and the manufactured product costs more there than it does here.

A Seat on the Platform.

During the ten years he was in Australia as bishop of Melbourne, Dr. Moorhouse, the present bishop of Manchester, made himself very popular by his geniality, tolerance and common sense. One night the bishop was about to lecture in a little township perched on a plateau in the Australian Alps. The hall was packed, but a young bushman, attired in a striped shirt and moleskin trousers, and wearing a flaming red comforter, was determined to push his way to the front. He thought he saw a vacant seat on the platform and made for it. "Would you mind shoving up a bit, missus?" he said to a quiet, pleasant-faced lady. "No, no, you mustn't sit there," interposed a local clergyman. "That's the bishop's wife." Nonsense," said the bishop, who had overheard the remark. "Squeeze up a bit, Mary." Mrs. Moorehouse laughingly obeyed, and the young bushman in many-colored attire sat by the side of the bishop's wife throughout the lecture.

Pneumatic Snow Plow.

A citizen of Atlanta, Ga., has invented an electricity-driven pneumatic snow-plow that is entirely unlike anything ever before brought out. The snow is scraped from the roadway by a shear, and then blown out of the way by an air blast from a blower, which latter is driven by two 30-horse power motors. When passing teams the wind gate may be closed and snow permitted to accumulate until the air is turned on again. Neither the snow remaining or removed is packed. The plow is adjusted in regular work to remove fifteen inches.

Cured Nervous Twitching and Sleeplessness.

Geo. Webster, of Forest, writes:—"For a number of years I suffered greatly from nervousness, twitching of the muscles and sleeplessness. I tried almost every known remedy without relief. I was induced as a last resort to try South American Nervine. The first bottle benefitted me, and five bottles cured me. It is a grand medicine, and I owe my life to it."

Mrs. Thomas Holder, of Aylmer, says:

"I have been a great sufferer for a good many years with Salt Rheum, so bad at times it was impossible for me to wash a dish or do any housework, but after taking one bottle of Sloan's Indian Tonic, it took every particle of the disease out of my system, and made a perfect cure. It has now been four years since I took the medicine and the disease has not returned yet.

THE CAMDEN FAIR.

The fair at Centreville on Saturday last was a pronounced success. There was a large crowd in attendance and the weather left nothing to be desired. The exhibits were were good and the speeding in the ring and the various special events close and exciting. Centreville is the possessor of a good half of a mile track, upon which the races were held. The most exciting race of the day was the green trot in which six horses entered. It took four heats to decide this race, the struggle between Gold Jack and Shoemaker for first place being an interesting one. In the first heat Pacer Pete, owned by Mr. Paterson, ran away and was drawn from the race. The following is a summary:

GIVE UP THEIR DEAD.

THE ALPINE GLACIERS YIELD ARKWRIGHT'S BODY AFTER 31 YEARS.

In This Latest Instance the Identification Is Absolutely Complete—One of the Most Thrilling of Mont Blanc Adventures Vividly Recalled.

The news has been received from Geneva, Switzerland, that the body of Capt. Henry Arkwright, buried under an avalanche, Oct. 13, 1866, has been recovered, says The Chicago Post. It was found almost two miles below the place where the intrepid Englishman lost his life, and was in the main well preserved. It had been hurled by the avalanche into a crevasse of the glacier, and had moved down the mountain side with that creeping giant of the Alps until it was restored at the melting edge of the ice. The feet and head are lost. They were doubtless ground away by the resistless crushing of the glacier in its movement. But the rest of the body is perfect. Identification is complete. The hands are preserved. The right hand is remarkably lifelike and natural in appearance. Even the red tint of blood is preserved in that member.

In the pocket of the gray waistcoat of the fashion of thirty years ago was found a blue-bordered white handkerchief quite as good as new. Capt. Arkwright's initials are embroidered in the corner. There is a gold stud in the linen collar, and a large stud in the shirt front with a small diamond star in the centre. Among the trinkets taken from the pockets was a silver cigarette case. The gold watch is entirely uninjured. With the chain it was found near the body, evidently having been dragged away in the slow movement of the glacier. An inquest was at once held by the justice of the peace, the Mayor, a doctor, and the local gendarmes. The remains were buried at Chamounix, awaiting orders from England if any of Capt. Arkwright's relatives or friends can be found.

The story of Capt. Arkwright's death is one of the most thrilling in the annals of Mont Blanc adventure. He had been an aide-de-camp to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland; was a scholar and also a traveler. But he was quite unused to Alp climbing. At 5.30 o'clock on the morning of Oct. 13, 1866, he, with his guide, Michel Simond, two porters named Francois and Joseph Tournier, and accompanied by Silvain Couttet of the Pierre Pointue and a servant—the latter two apparently being voluntary additions to a party already formed—left the Grand Mulets for the ascent of Mont Blanc. They took the route of the "ancient passage," and had gone but a little way, probably less than five miles, when an avalanche descended upon them. Such visitations have always been peculiarly common on this route, and it is and always has been regarded especially dangerous.

Couttet heard the rumbling and knew in an instant what was the matter. He gave the alarm, and, with his servant, succeeded in getting away. Capt. Arkwright and his guides, either because they did not understand or became confused, turned in the wrong direction and were overwhelmed in a tremendous avalanche of rocks, ice and snow. The Alpine Journal, vol. 2, page 383, says not a trace of the men could be discovered by the survivors. But this is plainly an error, for Venname Payott, writing in 1870, proves that the body of Francois Tournier was discovered by M. Couttet before he abandoned the search. He found the crushed body among the blocks of loosened ice on the Grand Plateau. Later, according to the author of "Oscillations des Quatre Grandes Glaciers," he discovered the bodies of two of the others and gave them burial. While he was still pursuing his search another avalanche descended and the last trace of the missing Englishman was lost.

Michael Payott, one of the porters, who was living last year, was awarded the "medaille d'honneur," and a diploma by the Ministry of the Interior for his conduct on the occasion. But every book of travel gives "bad guiding" as the cause of the lamentable accident.

In his "Tramp Abroad," Mark Twain gives a serious account of the loss of Capt. Arkwright—one of the few serious passages in the book. It may be remembered that in the same volume the author relates how, learning that this apparently stationary field of ice was really moving down to the valley of the Rhine, and desiring to visit that valley, he went out with his baggage, took a position on the glacier, and waited for it to deliver him at the riverside. But the truth is as his tale indicates. The glaciers, added to at the summit by perpetual condensation and freezing of the vapors that rise from the valley, press

DEADLY KIDNEY DISEASE.

The Only Way to Avoid The Great Destroyer.

Once clear to the individual that kidney disease is a result of uric acid and oxalate of lime, which have their place in the human system, hardening and forming into stone like substances, and the folly of treating such a disease with any medicine other than a liquid and one that will dissolve these solids, there will be little trifling with pills, powders and remedies of this character, which cannot possibly effect a permanent cure. The success of South American Kidney Cure is due to the fact that as a liquid it immediately reaches the diseased part, and dissolves these alkalies and hard substances. It never fails.

CREAM RIPENING.

Scientific Experiments With Bacteria Ferment in Milk Products.

Prof. Conn gives these results of experiments with bacteria ferment in milk, cream and its products:

1. The cream in ordinary dairies always contains bacteria, a large majority of which are perfectly wholesome and which give rise either to good flavors and aromas in the butter, or at least produce no injurious effect upon the cream. They are perfectly consistent with the production of the best quality of butter.

2. In the months of May and June the variety and number of these types of bacteria is decidedly greater than in the winter months, and this probability explains in part the better quality of the butter at these seasons.

3. Occasionally a dairy or a creamery may be impregnated with a species of bacteria that grows rapidly and produces a deleterious effect upon its butter. This will produce in all cases a falling off in the quality. The trouble may be due perhaps to a single cow, inasmuch as the milk of individual cows may sometimes contain species of organism not found in others, even in the same barn. It is, however, commonly impossible for the farmer or the butter-maker to find the source of such injurious bacteria.

4. Creameries and dairies will in many cases be supplied with bacteria giving rise to desirable flavors, aromas, and a proper amount of acid. This is commonly the case from the fact that the good flavoring species are abundant, but it will not always be the case. It is more common in June than at other seasons of the year, simply because the variety of bacteria is greater at this time and hence the greater likelihood that some species which produce the proper aroma and flavor will be present. Probably also some of the desirable species are especially abundant in the green food of cows in June.

5. If cream be inoculated with a large culture of some particular kind of bacteria this species will frequently develop so rapidly as to check the growth of the other bacteria present and thus perhaps prevent them from producing their natural effects. Hence it will follow that the use of starters will commonly give rise to favorable results even though the cream is already somewhat largely impregnated with other species of bacteria before the inoculation with the artificial starter. This fact lies at the basis of the use of artificial starters either with or without pasteurization. To produce the desirable result it is necessary to have the starter contain a large abundance of some favorable species which by its growth can both check the development of the ordinary cream bacteria and can develop a proper flavor by itself.

The Kingston News is kind enough to inform the officials of the Ontario Government that they will all be bounced when Mr. Whitney comes into power. This contingency is so remote that it need occasion these gentlemen no uneasiness.

Mr. Whitney is honest enough to admit that the Ontario Government doesn't tax the people but he affects to fear that the course the Government is pursuing will bring on direct taxation. Conservative stumpers have been holding up the bugaboo of direct taxation for the past fifteen years and still we are no nearer to it now than then.

Poor packing is the only thing that stands in the way of a large, profitable and permanent market being established for Canadian fruit in Britain. The last consignment of Canadian peaches, pears and tomatoes reached England in excellent condition, but the packing is complained of. Bad packing has militated against the sale of our apples in the Old Country during the past and our shippers should see to it that this defect is remedied.

Tarte is a bad man. Have we not the testimony of the Tory press to substantiate this. Parliament placed $3,439,920 at his disposal for the year 1896-97. Out of his appropriation Mr. Tarte expended during the year $1,748,939, leaving a balance of $690,981. By the economical administration of his department Mr. Tarte saved over $60,000 as compared with his predecessor in office. He is saving too much, and he knows too much; hence the Conservative wail.

Mr. St. John, of Toronto, an authority on hogs, affirms that the Ontario Government keeps one hog in a bog. The Government built a piggery on, at, or near a bog from which there arises an offensive fog. The fog from the bog proved detrimental to the health of the hogs and they wasted away until there was only one hog in the hoggery. Mr. St. John is of the opinion that the Government should keep more than one hog in the bog. With great originality, terseness and clearness he rises to remark: "It is time for a change." We heartily agree with him. If Mr. St. John doesn't soon change that speech he will become befogged and lose himself in the political bog which is yawning for him.

A FEW WORDS OF ADVICE BEFORE YOU D'E.

When you die at home your chief view is economy. Home dyeing economy means the very best results from a minimum of expense, time and trouble.

Your objects and desires are fully realized only when the Diamond Dyes are used for your work. If you are one of the careless unfortunates who simply take a package of dye of the color required from your dealer, you will in nine cases out of ten suffer loss and great disappointment, as many merchants will hand you some common dye ruinous to your goods, dangerous to handle and worthless as far as coloring power is concerned, and on which a very large profit is made. If you secure the Diamond Dyes your success is sure and certain.

Diamond Dyes have a long record of triumphs in home dyeing work; they have been used and tested in every land, and have become friends and family necessities. Happy women everywhere dye with Diamond Dyes.

Origin of Potato Bugs.

The Colorado potato beetle receives its common name from the fact that its native home was at the eastern base of the Rocky Mountains, where it fed upon a species of wild potatoes quite common to this region, known as the Sandbur (Solanum rostratum). It was collected there and described by Thomas Say in 1824. It was first mentioned as an injurious insect in 1859, when some of the early settlers of Western Nebraska reported it feeding in large numbers upon the Irish potato.

perpetual condensation and freezing of the vapors that rise from the valley, press downward with mountainous weight. There is no support beneath. The foot of the glacier is in the warm valley, and is perpetually melting.

The pressure from above crowds down the miles and miles of ice, in many places hundreds of feet in thickness, and it slides downward imperceptibly but surely. Here and there the inequalities of the rocky track over which it moves cause the glacier to bend and even break into crevasses. A number of adventurous Alp climbers have been hurled into these crevasses. In three cases it was impossible to find them, and the bodies have been delivered—one after twenty-five years—at the melting point or the verge of the glacier below.

But none has ever remained concealed for such a length of time as has this. Almost thirty-one years have passed since London was horrified to learn of the terrible accident. The news came just at the time of the visit of the Prince of Wales to Russia. The whole city and nation were cheering over the international event, and it would seem that the loss of one man, and he not especially famous or influential, would have had no effect upon the people. But the death of Capt. Arkwright touched a singular chord in English society. It was in the very height of the era of Alpine climbing, and the "first ascents" of various peaks were the most engrossing incidents among the upper classes of society. The gloomy reputation of the Grand Passage added to the horror of the event, and all London paused in the midst of its festivity to mourn.

Of course, the accident caused no checking of the custom. Mountain climbers continued to be social lions, and the rage continued until there were no more dangerous summits to scale without finding at the top the register of a band of common names. The methods of guiding have been perfected since Capt. Arkwright lost his life, and few accidents now occur.

Points in Country Road Making.

In country road-making there is much plowing of roadsides and scraping away of the surface soil. This is almost always a mistake. But the farmer should see to it that at least the work of road improvement does not obstruct the entrances to his fields. Making it easy for the farmer to use any part of his farm is for him about the most necessary part of road improvements. Out of this field into the road he will each year draw many loads, besides the loads of manure he will likely draw into it. If a plowed ridge or ditch obstructs the entrance to the field many wagons will be needlessly broken. If a ditch is required in the roadside opposite a gate, the path master may be obliged to convert it at that point into a sluiceway, with stone or tile passage for the water. An underdrain beside the road, three feet deep, with good outlet, is the best way to improve most poor roads. But whatever the method adopted, the farmer should see to it that road improvement does not obstruct gateways that he has to use.

Money in Medicinal Plants.

Many medicinal plants can be grown with profit, as the demand for some kinds is increasing. Absinthe (wormwood) can be raised as far north as New England, and this country imports it from Europe. Saffron, which sells for eight dollars per pound, may be grown in nearly all sections. Peppermint and spearmint find ready sale, and sage, which is well-known to every farmer, is imported, frequently selling at $150 per ton. Then there are hoarhound, boneset, mandrake, bloodroot, pennyroyal, etc., which are regarded as weeds in some localities, all of which are largely used and have a value in market.

A Good Bed For Winter Wheat.

Wherever the potato crop can be got off in time for seeding with fall grain, it makes the very best seed bed. No plowing is needed if the weeds are kept down. It is only necessary to pile the potato vines in heaps and burn them, starting the fire in a brush heap, if the potato tops are too green to burn readily. A great deal of plant food is developed after growing a crop of potatoes. It is chiefly water and carbon, with some potash, which is mostly found in the potato tops.

ONE HONEST MAN.

Dear Editor.—Please inform your readers, that if written confidentially, I will mail, in a sealed letter, particulars of a genuine, honest, home cure, by which I was permanently restored to health and manly vigor after years of suffering from nervous debility, sexual weakness, night losses and weak shrunken parts. I was robbed and swindled by the quacks until nearly lost faith in mankind, but thank heaven I am now well, vigorous and strong, and wish to make this certain means of cure known to all sufferers. I have nothing to sell and want no money, but being a firm believer in the universal brotherhood of man, I am desirous of helping the unfortunate to regain their health and happiness. I promise you perfect secrecy. Address with stamp, WM. T. MULFORD, Agents' Supplies, P.O. Box 59, St. Henri, Que.

whole length. The whole length of the measure is conveniently about eight inches. A handle bent as shown at the top and soldered together gives a firm hold, and also will hang on the rim of the weigh can.

With a teacup, and a bowl of the double strength solution on the scale arm a dip into the milk and one into the solution decides the quality of the milk. This weigh-room measure, says Hoard's Dairyman, from which the article and illustration are reproduced, may be well made at a cost of only 25 cents.

Profit in Winter Dairying.

When convenient to a good market a better profit can be realized from winter dairying than in summer. There is a better demand for milk and butter, and if care is taken to produce a good article a better price can be realized. But it is not advisable to go into the business haphazard.

So far as can be done the farmer may seek to diversify his products. The conditions under which the farm work must be done should determine what line of farming should be the principal industry.

One of the first essentials in profitable dairying is good cows, and in winter dairying it is quite an item to have them come fresh in the fall.

Another item that must be looked after in good season is good shelter for the cows. There must be plenty of room; the quarters must be comfortably warm, and yet clean and well ventilated, so that there will be no foul odors. In order to economize time, and in this way lessen the cost of production, the quarters should be arranged conveniently, both as regards cleaning and feeding.

To make dairying most profitable liberal feeding is necessary. This means that the cows that are giving milk must have as much wholesome, nutritious food as they will eat and digest. There must be a good variety; this is necessary in order to keep up a good appetite. A cow must eat well if she is to milk well. She may eat well and convert her food into growth or gain, but she cannot milk well unless she is well fed.

Feminine Dairy Wisdom.

In these close times it will not pay to winter unprofitable animals—now is the time to decide and begin to feed everything that is to be turned off.

Little things represent the difference between profit and loss.

A well bred and well raised calf makes the cheapest and most satisfactory cow.

Dairymen complain everywhere that good cows are difficult to procure.

The way out of the difficulty is to breed and rear your own cows. In this way you can improve your dairy every year. By using a thoroughbred butter sire and rearing heifers from the very best cows, the problem is solved.

If you have everything else all right and let the cream stand until it is too sour, you will reduce the value of the butter made from it several cents per pound.

The butter will have a sour smell and taste and will rapidly become rancid.

The cream should be stirred frequently so that it will ripen evenly.

The butter should be packed as quickly as possible and excluded from the air, and taken to the consumer while the aroma is delicious.

The practice is becoming more firmly established every day of eating freshly made butter. Consumers have learned to appreciate it, and will have no other.

How to Fatten Dry Cows.

The most good we ever got out of pumpkins was to take a dry cow we wanted to fatten, tie her in the barn and give her all she would eat and she would seem to fatten very fast. Then sell her to the meat man; don't kill her yourself. Our method of feeding western feeds is to purchase that kind that will, with the kind we have, bring the ration up to one of protein to four of carbohydrates, and that is generally largely cotton seed with some shorts.—R. W. Ellis, in Farm News.

FATTENING FOWLS.

They Should Be Separated and Put By Themselves.

Place six or eight together in a close coop without a roost, and just sufficiently large to allow their moving about without crowding each other. The front of the coop or box only needs to be lathed open work, and should be arranged so as to make it nearly dark as soon as they are done feeding, since during the balance of their existence the more quietly they can be kept the more they will improve. They need no exercise. It must be borne in mind that fat only is added by this process, the lean or flesh must be made before, and unless the fowl has attained the proper standard in this respect it is almost useless to try to fatten it. Now give them plenty of fresh water and all they will eat for two or three weeks in this kind of coop, and at the end of that period they will be better fit for the butcher than they will ever be after that period. The manner of feeding and keeping the fowls in this confinement is a very simple affair, and we have found it efficacious as well as feasible. Cooked food, and all they will devour morning and night, with cracked corn and wheat at noon, will fatten healthy poultry in less time than any other food that we have ever experimented with. The mash should be composed of good corn meal two parts and boiled potatoes one part. Into a pailful of this meal and vegetable food, well mixed, while hot, drop one pound of lard, tallow or pork scraps, and mix this fat substance through the mass. Feed this while warm, and give only what the fowls will eat up clean at a meal.—Western Plowman.

A Joy That Endures.

Cures Made By Paine's Celery Compound Are Permanent.

Recent Testimony Of a Lady Cured Years Ago.

Some years ago Mrs. D. O'Connor, of Guelph, Ont., suffered from the tortures of indigestion, neuralgia, heart trouble, noise in the head, sleeplessness, despondency and weakness. Her case was an exceptionly serious one, as her troubles had been dragging her down for over twenty-five years. At the time her case quite baffled the skill of the best doctors.

Getting wearied with medical treatment that gave no promising results, she was fortunately directed to that life saver, Paine's Celery Compound, and like thousands before her, she found a new life. Mrs. O'Connor was recently asked the question, "What is your present opinion of Paine's Celery Compound?" She answered as follows:

"In reply to your communication regarding Paine's Celery Compound, would say that I cheerfully recommend it to any one afflicted as I was. It did for me all that was required. My advice to every one I come in contact with is 'Always keep a bottle of Paine's Celery Compound in the house.' Several people have used it on my recommendation and have been benefitted. You can use these lines in any way you desire."

CAPONS.

The Market Results of the Operation by One Who Knows.

We reproduce herewith the cut of capon, showing just how this class of poultry should be dressed for this market. You will notice that the feathers are left on the neck, legs, wings and rump, and also that the tail feathers are left on. Otherwise capons should be dressed for this market the same as other fowls, except that they should be dry-picked, as it would be impossible to scald them and leave part of the feathers on, and if they are scalded, the same as other chickens, they will not bring any more than the price of common fowls, for they are distinguished more by the way they are picked than in any other manner. All other chickens sell better in this market scalded, while turkeys sell best dry-picked.

P. S. Sprague, of the Sprague Commission Company of Chicago, a firm which deals largely in poultry, writes as follows on the subject of capons and their market:

Capons are in the best demand with us from the first of November until the first of May. For the last year or two there have been a great many common roosters dressed in capon style and sent to this market, which has hurt the capon trade some, but still good capons always bring a good price. The larger the birds are, the more they will bring per pound. Birds that weigh less than

A SUFFERER IS RESTORED TO HEALTH AND STRENGTH.

Suffered From Weak Heart and Could Not Safely Walk Any Distance—How the Pulse of Life Was Adjusted.

From the Cornwall Freeholder.

The romance of unwritten facts of real life far exceeds the rich eleborations of fiction. A peep behind the scenes would furnish us with adequate proof that there is more of care, trial and severe anxiety in human life than floats on the surface. We find many whose experience has almost incessantly fluctuated between health and sickness; little if any of this is obtruded upon the notice of the world, or breathed into human ear. You may secure the confidence of some of these sufferers who will rehearse to you a dark catalogue of pains and aches that are often ill understood by the friends and inadequately treated by the physician. Thanks be to the mighty genius that discovered the now famous panacea for the ills to which humanity is subjected when suffering from impoverished blood or a shattered nerve system, thousands have, and thousands are still using to the greatest advantage Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. They have passed the ordeal of experiment again and again with ever increasing honor. The following statement is from one who was rescued from seeming permanent enfeeblement and distressing heart action. Miss Fisher, of Lancaster township, Glengarry county, is a maiden lady. About eight years ago Miss Fisher was seized with weakness and a distressing sensation in the region of the heart. It was attributed to several causes, all possibly more or less true, they were overwork, exposure etc. She was certainly weak and the action of the heart was abnormally rapid. The doctor in attendance pronounced the ailment nervous palpitation of the heart and she received treatment accordingly for two years. At this stage she took to her bed she was so low. For twelve months she lay receiving only domestic attention. She improved somewhat, however, and was able to be taken to a friend of hers near Lancaster village, Mrs. J. Hancy, where she was under medical attendance and took medicine for about

To be able to measure out various quantities have slides arranged at different distances above the bottom, the spaces between each one and the bottom slide holding quarts, a peck, half bushel, bushel, etc., as desired. One slide will answer for all the openings above the lower one. A bit of leather over the slots inside will keep the grain from coming out of the open slots. This device will be found a very great convenience and labor-saver.—Orange Judd Farmer.

Rations For Horses.

We talk about the loss of the horse business from one cause or another, but the most mischief comes from the want of proper food, says an exchange. This means loss to the horse and greater loss to the farmer. A good per cent. of the horses seen on the streets of any town show insufficient or unbalanced food supply. Horses that have been ill-fed when young are almost invariably small, long-legged light-carcassed and narrow-chested. Some of them have a great deal of energy, but all are soon exhausted, unfit for protracted exertion. Grown-up horses, when much reduced by deficient nourishment, require more food to put them into working order than would have kept them for two or three months in the condition they require to possess when going into work. When a horse is starved, besides losing strength and flesh, his bowels get full of worms and his skin covered with lice. Very often he takes mange, and sometimes he does not moult, or the hair falls out suddenly and entirely off, leaving the skin nearly bald for a long time. The skin of an ill-fed horse is always rigid, sticking to the ribs, and their hair dull, staring, soft, dead-like. If not famished to death they recover strength and animation with good and sufficient feeding, but starvation always spoils the shape of a growing horse.

Anchoring a Corner or End Post.

Where wire fencing is used, whether woven wire or straight strands, it is of great importance to have the corner or end posts firm and unyielding. A good way to accomplish this is shown in the she ground and a stout piece of galvanized iron wire is tied firmly about it and stretched tightly to the upper end of the post, as shown. A corner post will need two wires similarly anchored.

Orchard and Garden.

Young orchards often need additional fertility.

Be on the lookout for the leaf-eating caterpillar.

In pruning cut out all weak and crowded branches.

There is little danger of injuring an orchard by manuring.

All pruning cuts made at this time should be covered with oil or wax.

Keep a good lookout for tent caterpillars during the summer.

Weeds and suckers should be kept down between the rows of raspberries and blackberries.

You can crowd fruit trees and plants only at the risk of getting reduced crops of inferior fruit.

The secret of growing extra fine strawberries is to cut off the runners as fast as they appear.

Fruit trees that have been grafted need to be looked after to see that the stock does not make shoots.

With a young orchard at this time it will be a good plan to stop cultivation and mulch carefully, leaving the soil in good tilth.—St. Louis Republic.

Salting Cows Regularly.

Salt is an important aid to digestion, and especially so to all ruminant animals. If cows are not salted frequently they will eat more than is good for them when they do get access to salt. In large quantities salt is laxative, it being an irritant to the bowels, which are therefore purged to get rid of it. Failure to salt regularly will make the cream more difficult to turn into butter, thus repaying the farmer for his carelessness by giving him a longer and harder job at churning.

per pound. Birds that weigh less than seven pounds each will not bring any more than common chickens, as a rule. Each year the call in this market for genuine, large capons becomes greater. The reason is that people are becoming educated to the enjoyment of the luxury.

Looking over the quotations on Jan. 1st we note that large and choice capons sold, dressed, at 45c per pound, while mixed lots brought 12c per pound. What are termed "slips" (cockerels that have been imperfectly caponized) sold at from 8c to 10c per pound. A capon will bring upwards of three times as much as a cock. Capons grow to be larger and heavier than cocks and may, if well bred, be made to attain a size of from 12 to 15 pounds each. A capon of such weight will sell for from $2 to $3, while a cock will not bring more than 50 cents. Yet it costs just as much to raise cocks as to raise capons.

When raising capons the breed should be carefully considered. If the operation is performed early the capon will not develop a comb. The operation should be performed before the bird is three months old. It is a waste of time to use small breeds and scrub, as they will only sell as second-class stock. The largest capons, according to our information, are produced by crossing a Dorking male with Brahama hens, and the best in quality are produced by keeping the pullets of the Dorking-Brahma cross and mating them with an Indian game male. The capons so produced combine the size of the Brahma, the compactness of the Dorking and the full breast and juicy qualities of the Indian game. Other good crosses may be made by the use of Houdan male with Brahma, Cochin or Plymouth Rock hens, or the Dorking or Indian game may be used in place of the Houdan. The hen should always be large. The form and quality are mostly derived from the sire.

A capon grows and fattens on a small amount of food. The first point should be to secure large frames and fatten them after they are fully matured. If the capon is produced from a large breed it should have plenty of time for growth—about fifteen months—for every pound is valuable. The food should be nourishing but not fattening. Corn is unnecessary until near the time for fattening. Wheat, oats, pounded bone, meat, milk and green food, all that it can eat twice a day will be sufficient to help the capon rapidly in growth.

Capons should be put in a small yard (not too crowded) three weeks before being sold and fed four times a day, giving plenty of corn, and also a variety of other food. One of the best preparations for fattening capons is cornmeal and ground oats, equal parts, adding half a pound of crude tallow to every quart of the mixture. Moisten the whole with skimmed milk or boiling water and season with salt.

Buyers are not so particular about the color of the legs and skin of the capon as they are of its size and attractive appearance in other respects, yet a yellow leg capon holds an advantage. Yellow legs may be secured by using Plymouth Rock males on pullets that have been produced by mating a Dorking male and a Brahma hen. Such a capon will be of excellent quality and will always bring a good price. Light Brahma males are also mated with Cochin hens in order to secure large capons, but they do not have that full breast which is imparted by the Houdan, Dorking or Game. If the color of the legs is of no consequence, the Houdan male and Langshan hen produce excellent capons when mated.

The comparison of a well-bred, well-kept and well-fed capon with a cock of the same breeding, will show that where a cock reaches ten pounds weight in a given period of time, the capon will weigh one-third more, and the difference in price is three to four times as much. If, instead of keeping the yards full of useless and unprofitable cockerels, a ponizing were resorted to, there would be a greater desire to have more cockerels hatched than pullets. By keeping good breeds, neighbors may be induced to use the eggs for hatching purposes. Then the surplus cockerels may be bought at a slight advance, as they will prefer to keep the pullets for their own use. By then providing the neighbors with pure bred males every season there would be no limit to the supply of eggs for hatching cockerels for capons.

attendance and took medicine for about three years. At the end of this time she could not safely venture to walk out even a short distance. All this time she complained of her heart. About two years ago she began taking Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, from this date she began what proved a steady restoration of nervous energy. During the summer of 1896 the improvement was marked. She was able by the middle of the summer to do as much work and walking as most ordinary women, and so satisfactory and apparently permanent is the cure that Miss Fisher has gone to her former home. Such are the unvarnished facts of a remarkable case. The malady was persistent, tenacious and hard to fight. But the constant use of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills wrought a marvellous change, which Miss Fisher's friend said might be profitably known to many others.

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills cure by going to the root of the disease. They renew and build up the blood, and strengthen the nerves, thus driving disease from the system. Avoid imitations by insisting that every box you purchase is enclosed in a wrapper bearing the full trade mark, Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People.

Help For Threshing.

When threshing is done by steam power, it is the constant effort of those who run these threshers to have the work of threshing in each neighborhood hurried through in as short a season as possible. Their own expenses are quite heavy, and the threshing business will not pay unless they can get steady work while the season lasts. It is the farmer's interest on the other hand, to postpone grain threshing until fall work is well out of the way. The grain is in better condition for threshing then, and, what is quite as important it is not so difficult to secure the help needed. To keep a steady flow of grain in the straw from mow or stack to the machine requires three, four or five men, according to the distance the bundles have to be pitched. All are needed that can work without being in each other's way. It is the hardest work that is now left to be done on the farm, and is also the dirtiest.

Plowing by Electricity.

A system of electric plowing has been worked out on a commercial basis by A. Borsig of Berlin. Overhead conductors do not extend into all the fields, but are tapped by temporary wires laid on the ground. It is possible with an electric conductor of 500 meters and a plowing rope of 300 meters working length, to plow 222 acres from one centre of operation. Mr. Borsig states that with five plows and fixed engines of 250 horse power, 6000 acres of medium heavy ground can be plowed to a depth of 14 inches at a cost of 95 cents per acre. The use of separate engines increases the cost by 14 cents per acre.

This is the complaint of thousands at this season. They have no appetite; food does not relish. They need the toning up of the stomach and digestive organs, which a course of Hood's Sarsaparilla will give them. It also purifies and enriches the blood, cures that distress after eating and internal misery only a dyspeptic can know, creates an appetite, overcomes that tired feeling and builds up and sustains the whole physical system. Wise Mirth

There is a saying of Chamfort which many serious-minded people, under the pressure of care and work, would do well to lay to heart: "The most thoroughly wasted of all days is that on which one has not laughed." It has often been said that only they who take life with profound seriousness can be really humorous, for they alone perceive those fundamental contrasts which make humor possible.

Mr. Ford has laid the country under lasting obligation by correcting the impression that Washington never laughed. Deeply serious as he was by nature, and retired and non-communicative as he was in large companies, no man could appreciate and enjoy fun of any good kind more thoroughly than the great leader when with his intimates. It is true Emerson hated to laugh, but his radiant smile was better than laughter. Carlyle, on the contrary, was given to earthshaking laughter—a kind of Berserker laughter, not without undertones of pathos running through it. Lincoln's love of stories, both in the hearing and the telling, was a safety valve for one whose tremendous burdens fell on a temperament deeply tinged with sadness.—The Outlook.

Artemus Ward and His Lectures

The abashed manner of the lecturer, the personal peculiarities of which he himself made fun, the difficulties with his panorama, which in general was pointed as badly as possible, because execution was expensive, the difficulties with the moon and the prairie fires, which would shoot up and flare out at the wrong moments, to the apparent consternation of the lecturer—all these, to say nothing of the humor of his talks, are reported to have kept his hearers in a frenzy of laughter.

Who can wonder that they were quite overcome by the gravity with which he would point to dark regions in his canvas and say: "These are intended for horses; I know they are, because the artist told me so. After two years he came to me one morning and said: 'Mr. Ward, I cannot conceal it from you any longer; they are horses.'"—The Bookman.

Only Diamond Fields in Russia.

Count P. P. Schuvaloff is the fortunate possessor of the only diamond fields in Russia. On his estates, comprising 200,000 hectares, five gems were accidentally found a few years ago. The first diamond was picked up on the place in 1829, and in the years since then about 150 have been discovered. Some years ago the Count decided to carry on the hunt for more diamonds with vigor, though whether or not he has done so is not known to the present writer. The Count is among the wealthiest landed proprietors in Russia, and retired to the Russian Ambassador to Berlin.

HOW LEAD PENCILS ARE MADE.

No Lead Used in Their Manufacture, Yet the Name Clings to Them.

Once pieces of lead were used for marking, and we continue to use the word, though lead is no longer a part of our pencils. The Philadelphia Times in speaking of these useful articles regrets that history has failed to record the name of the great genius who gave to the world that most useful little instrument, and says we have heard all about the discovery of burnt snuff and the sewing machine and the typewriter and all that, but the inventor of the lead pencil has, evidently, gone down into the shadow of oblivion "unwept, unhonored and unsung."

"I have to laugh at the queer ideas some people have about pencils," said a manufacturer. "You will scarcely believe it, but the opinions of people who know nothing about it seem to be divided between the melting of the lead and pouring it into the hole in the wood and cutting out the lead to fit the hole. The part that goes into your pencils other than the lead is cedar, and comes from the swamps of Florida. It is obtained from the fallen trees that lie there. There are men there who make a business of supplying to pencil manufacturers the cedar in blocks which are sawed to the length of the pencil, some thick, to receive the lead, and others thin, for the piece that is glued over the other containing the lead. The blocks are sawed for four pencils each. The groove is made by a saw, and in this the lead lies.

"I know," continued the manufacturer, "that not one out of ten thousand persons has the least idea of what this lead is. It is here a fine black powder; that is graphite, and costs somewhere about twenty-five cents a pound. This whitish substance is German clay. It comes across the ocean as ballast in vessels and all it costs us is for freight. We mix clay and powder together and grind them in a mill, moistening the mass carefully during the process, until the two are thoroughly assimilated, and reduced to a paste that is about the consistency of putty. Here are the leads for the leads, into which we press this paste of graphite and clay. These leads are kept in hot glue and are placed in the grooves as the blocks are made ready. When the lead is put in there snugly and forever, the thin block is glued to the thick one and left to dry thoroughly."

Brandy Farmers.

The brandy farmers of Charente are a distinct class. Every one of them, even if he own no more than a patch of six or seven acres, has his own still and manufactures his own spirit. Most of the stills which I saw were exceedingly of the most primitive type, like Highland bothies or the rude huts in which Irish "potheen" used to be, and I dare say even now is, manufactured in some wild parts of Ireland. The apparatus is of the simplest kind—just a boiler, with receiver and the "worm" or serpentine, a mere tube thrust into a big cylinder of cold water. There are usually two of these humble stills in operation, and wood is generally used as fuel. When the farmer commences making his brandy he continues working his stills day and night until he has converted all his wine into spirit. The brandy at this stage, is perfectly colorless, and contains the whole of the essential oil, which has subsequently to be removed by a drastic process of filteration. This, however, the farmer leaves to the merchant to whom he brings his brandy for sale.

Many of these brandy farmers are very wealthy. I was told of one worth £100,000, another £80,000, a third £60,000, and a considerable number with £30,000 and £20,000 apiece—sums which figure out magnificently in francs. But to look at them, you would never guess that they possess as many pence as they have pounds. For, however rich they may be, they still retain the dress and style of peasants. They make no attempt to ape the manners and fashions of those above them. Each generation is content to live as its good sire did—a frugal, hard-working life, with its one or two holidays and indulgences, and the

MRS. DRIFTER'S SAY.

Mrs. Drifter grew confidential the other evening. Some of Drifter's friends had called, and the subject of his adventures in the South came up.

"Of course, it is all right," said Mrs. Drifter, "for Drifter to tell about the trials he endured when he was the editor of a paper in Texas. I never put in such a time in my life. I expected that Drifter would come home to me shot full of holes some night. When I was down at his office reading the proofs of that cunning little paper he got out it used to make my blood run cold to hear those men talk about gun plays so and so had made up in somebody's saloon.

"Drifter reassured me by telling me that the crack of a pistol did not always mean that somebody had been hit. But you know what a brave man Drifter is. No, you don't, either. You say you don't know anything about the time he saved our lives down in Texas? I don't think I ever realized before just how courageous Drifter is. You know I had not seen a ranch nor a herd of cattle since I arrived in Texas, and I begged Drifter to take me where the real Panhandle cattle could be seen, so he took me out to the stockyards beyond Fort Worth.

"Times were very, very hard down there, and the packing house was closed, and there were no signs of life at the stockyards. We walked around and around the huge inclosure, and I tried to imagine what it must be like when the herds of Texas steers came in from the Panhandle. We had gone quite a little distance from the high board fence, and were admiring the scenery, when some cows came strolling along. We stood watching and admiring them until about 50 or 75 had passed us, when all at once there loomed up before us an immense Texas bull. His manner was dignified and masterful. He looked at us, elevated his head, sniffed, and my heart gave a jump.

"That was when Drifter and his inborn bravery came to the front. It is needless to say that I was frightened. I thought my last moment had come. The fence of the stockyards must have been 50 feet high; at least it looked so to me. Drifter afterward said that it was not over to the banks of the Trinity. Sure enough, there was the boat and excursion steamer on a small scale, to be sure, but a boat, nevertheless. Believe me, there was not two feet of water in the deepest part of that wonderful river. One of the Texans got real mad when Drifter suggested that it would be a good idea to put the boat on trucks, so as to give and excursion up and down the river on wheels, at any rate.

"'You wait until we have rain,' said one of the Texans, 'then you won't poke any fun at Trinity River navigation.'

"The rain finally came, and there was enough of it to satisfy all Texas. 'Now we will have our boat ride,' said Drifter, and we hurried over to Dallas. Alas, Trinity River was then so high that the excursion boat would either have to be pulled over the bridge or stay at its dock. They couldn't afford to cut a hole in the bridge, you see, just for an excursion, and the river had risen to the level of the bridge.

"At last accounts the Trinity River excursion had been abandoned. Drifter told me that the boat couldn't make much headway on account of the dust in the river bottom, and I believed him. Why, actually they have to wait for a rainstorm down there before they could have outdoor baptism services, for, you see, it wouldn't look very well to have people lie down in the bed of the river

Use of Olive Oil.

Olive oil is now used in many ways at one time never thought of. Besides being more largely used medicinally, it enters into various processes of cooking much more extensively than it did.

It is well known that good eggs fried in olive oil are much better flavored than when any other kind of fat is used.

In massage, bathing, and for numerous other purposes the use of this most natural, valuable food is greatly extending. The value of a good olive oil is beginning to be more generally recognized throughout the world than it formerly was. Eminent authorities have experimented with it, and found it a potent agent for any defects of the excretory ducts, especially the skin. Eczema has rapidly disappeared upon a discontinuance of starch foods and a substitution of a diet of fresh and dried fruits, milk, eggs and olive oil.

Great Tea Consumption.

In England the consumption of tea amounts to five and three quarter pounds a year for each person, children included. Some persons insist that the excessive drinking of tea is what ruins the English woman's beauty, as it has a tendency to make the tip of the nose red.

G. A. BROWNE, Agent, Napanee.
H. B. SHERWOOD, Superintendent.
R. C. CARTER, Agent, Deseronto.

Drifter afterward said that it was not more than 15, but I know that the trees around it were not so high as the fence. He grasped me by the hand and said:

"'Little girl, run for the fence. I will stay here and protect you.'

"I was brought up in the country, and I know it is the height of foolishness to run from a wild animal, so I flatly refused. 'If we are going to die, we will die together, Drifter,' said I, 'but the best thing to do is to back slowly away from that awful bull.' We backed toward the fence, and the bull paced toward us, never taking his eyes off us. I know I could hear Drifter's heart beat, but it must have been anxiety for me, for he is not afraid of anything.

"'Get behind that tree,' he said, 'and his voice sounded as if it was away off somewhere, and I felt as if we were to be separated forever. Reassuringly he said:

"'I will see that he does not touch you.' With that he took out his little pocket knife, opened the blade, which was not over three inches long, and said: 'There!' with as much defiance in his tone as if he had been behind a stone barricade and armed with a Martini rifle. Somehow or other we got to that fence at last. It was evident that Drifter would not let me take any chances alone, for he got there as soon as I did, and if you ever saw two people climb a high fence in the quickest possible space of time, it was Mr. and Mrs. Drifter.

"We sat there on the top of the fence until dusk, and Drifter never let go of the knife. I really believe that if the bull had attacked me Drifter would have stabbed him with that penknife. In the evening, after I had mustered up courage enough, we made our way, keeping close by the fence, until we reached a little hotel connected with the stockyards. Drifter never said a word about the adventure, and you would not have thought he had done anything remarkable, but I know that he saved my life from the wild Texas bull."

It took Mrs. Drifter's friends some time to rise to a proper appreciation of the courage displayed by her husband in that time of danger, and after she had fanned herself vigorously, she continued:

"You ought to get Drifter to tell you about the time he went out to the lake near Fort Worth. I was just dying for a sight of a body of water. It did seem to me as if I would dry up there in Texas unless I could get within sound of the ocean's roar, so Drifter did the best he could. He took me out to a pleasure resort about five miles from the city, at a place called Arlington. The trolley cars ran there, and the company made a great fuss over the Arlington lake. I told Drifter I would be satisfied if I could spend a few hours in a sailboat out there. At any rate, I would see a body of water once again in my life.

"Well, we had our dinner at the hotel, and I said: 'Now, Drifter, let us get right out on that lake as quick as possible.' The people in the hotel told us in what direction to walk to the lake, and we walked. We kept on walking, and not a sign of a lake was to be seen. At last we found our way back to the trolley line, and asked one of the railroad men where the Arlington lake was.

"'Oh,' he said, 'I guess they have not turned the water on yet. There isn't much of a crowd. Last Sunday there was a big excursion, then you could have seen the lake full of water.'

"'Turn the water on!' I exclaimed. 'I thought they advertised sailboats and pond lilies and all that sort of thing?'

"'So they do, ma'am,' said the trolley man, 'but you know it's pretty dry country down here, and they can't afford to waste water on that lake unless there's a crowd.' Drifter bristled up and said: 'What we want to know is where the lake is and when there is any water.'

"The trolley man was accommodating. He walked along with us, took us up what he called a hill, and then pointed out a hole in the ground about 50 yards round, and as dry as the hotel porch. Of course, I was amused, but nevertheless disappointed.

"'Never mind,' said Drifter. 'I will take you for a sail on the Trinity River some afternoon. They are talking now of running a line of boats up the Trinity from Galveston, and it will seem like old times to get on a real big excursion steamer.'

"For the next week or two Trinity River navigation was thoroughly agitated in the Texan papers. As near as I could make out, the principal difficulty seemed to be that they were clearing the river of snags. I read that snag boat No. 1 had accomplished wonders; that snag boat No. 2 had just left Dallas, and I fairly revelled in the anticipation of a trip on the broad bosom of the Trinity. Then the newspapers began to print columns about the need of rain, and it was reported that the snag boats were tied up, owing to the drought.

"One day Drifter took me on the train people lie down in the bed of the river and have water poured over them from a sprinkling pot.

"If we didn't have river excursions or sails on the lake, there was always something to make it lively during our stay in Texas," continued Mrs. Drifter. "I wish you could have been down there when croquet was in season. I went to a croquet party one evening when we first settled in Fort Worth. I enjoyed it very much, but I didn't understand at that time that one ought to wear hip boots or armor in a simple little game like lawn croquet.

"The next day I was a sight to behold. I hadn't seen any mosquitoes, but it was evident that I had been settled upon by a swarm. My lower limbs were spotted with the most irritating and exasperating mementoes of the bites of some insects. I confided my trouble to one of the ladies in the house, and she said, consolingly:

"'Oh, that's nothing. You have been bitten by chigres, that's all.'

"'Chigres, what are they?' I asked.

"'Why a chigre is a little red bug,' she replied, 'the most persistent insect you ever heard of. You got them playing croquet on the lawn. We have not had one at our house this season, but they have them over there. You ought to put some salt on the places where you were bitten. Rub them with salt and water, and you will get the chigres off.'

"'Surely they are not on me now,' I said.

"'Yes, they are,' said the lady. 'Chigres bury themselves under your skin. If you look closely you can see them.'

"By the aid of Drifter's microscope, I was able to detect in the centre of each inflamed spot a little bright red insect, something like a spider. When I poked it with the point of a needle it ran with incredible rapidity. It is needless to say I didn't play croquet on that particular lawn again. Drifter told me that chigres in Texas were like the chills and fever in Missouri. The natives didn't mind them.

"I found out in time how the natives protected themselves against the inroads of the spider-like chigre. Having been invited to a picnic in the woods, I asked a woman who had lived in Texas a dozen years or more what to do. I told her I couldn't possibly survive another attack of chigres, and Drifter had told me the people who subscribed for his paper would be offended if I declined the invitation to the picnic. She told me to follow her example, and I would not have to worry about chigres. She said:

"'Whenever I go to a picnic in Texas, I prepare myself for the chigres. Do as I do. In the morning before starting out, rub yourself thoroughly from head to foot with a chunk of salt pork. Chigres don't like pork, and they won't light on you.'

"I did not go to the picnic," continued Mrs. Drifter.

A Paradise For Invalids.

Tourist—It seems to me that this is a very unhealthy place. Don't people die pretty often down here?

Native—Stranger, I consider this the healthiest place on the hull footstool. Do people die here? Well, I should say not. Why, look here; my brother has been sick abed ever since we struck these parts fifteen years ago, and he ain't dead yit."—New York Truth.

Her Postscript.

The important part of a woman's letter is always in the postscript. A Somerville girl wrote a four-page letter, full of courteous phrases, to a young man, explaining why she could not accept his offer of marriage; and then added a postscript, saying: "On second thought, I have decided that I will marry you after all."—Somerville Journal.

His Purpose.

"Why do you like to associate with Glanders so much? That fellow's everlasting babble would tire me to death."

"Well, I'll tell you. Sometimes I get to thinking that I don't know very much, and then I want to get into his company. After listening to him for five minutes my respect for myself is always fully restored, and I am cheerful again."

Out of Place.

"That new cook from the country that the Blueberries have been boasting about insisted on sitting on the porch last night when they had company."

"Didn't she feel out of place?"

"She did afterward."—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

A QUESTION CF TIME.

On This Particular Occasion the Rule Didn't Work.

"For mercy sakes, Henry!" exclaimed Mrs. Flimpson, as she entered the room in full street costume, gloves and all, "haven't you begun to get your things on yet? You know the train goes at half-past and it will take us at least fifteen minutes to walk to the station. I never did see such a man."

"Time enough," replied Mr. Flimpson, without looking up from his paper. "It is only 7 now, and there is no need to start before twenty minutes past. We can get to the station easily in five minutes, but I'll give you another five minutes' leeway. Sit down and make yourself comfortable, Mary. Don't get yourself in a flurry."

"But, Henry, my watch says ten minutes past."

"Whoever knew a woman's watch to be within an hour of being right? I tell you it is only 7."

"But how do you know your watch isn't slow?"

"Because I know it isn't. You could set the sun by that watch any day in the year. Look at the clock if you don't believe it."

"But the clock may be wrong."

"Bother! I tell you we've got lots of time; time to burn."

"If we don't get that train there isn't another for an hour and a half."

"Don't make any difference if there isn't another for a month. You women folks are always in such a hurry! You want to hang around the gloomy station for half an hour, I suppose. Well, I don't. Now make yourself easy. When did you ever know me to lose a train?"

"But, Henry—"

"I tell you we've got plenty of time. Now sit down and make yourself easy."

For ten minutes longer this went on. Mrs. Flimpson getting more uneasy every second and Mr. Flimpson more tranquil. Finally he laid down his paper, put on his shoes, with provoking deliberation, then his coat and hat; and then sat down to draw on his gloves. All this time Mrs. Flimpson was in a boiling state of impatience. She knew they'd lose the train, it was always the way, and all that sort of thing.

At last they were off, and all the way to the station Mrs. Flimpson was two or three steps ahead of her spouse, who would not hurry, the provoking thing! although Mrs. Flimpson insisted that she could hear the train coming.

When they got to the station, strange to relate, the train had not departed, it hadn't arrived and didn't arrive for five minutes. As a matter of fact, Flimpson's watch was right on the dot, just

ORCHARD CULTIVATION.

Fruit Must Receive as Good Care as All Other Crops.

Good tillage increases the available food supply of the soil; it also conserves its moisture.

Trees should be made to send their roots deep into the soil, in order to fortify against drought. This is done by draining the soil and by plowing the orchard rather deep.

This deep plowing should begin the very year the trees are set out, and it should be continued every spring until the habit of the tree is established.

Moisture is retained in the upper soil by very frequent but shallow tillage, by means of which the surface of the land becomes a mulch for the soil beneath.

Tillage should be begun just as soon as the ground is dry enough in spring.

This tillage should be repeated as often as once in ten days through growing season—from spring until July or August.

Tillage should not exist for the purpose of killing weeds.

Late cultivation may be injurious by inducing a late growth. At all events it can be of small utility when the tree begins to mature and rains become frequent. This season of respite gives the grower the opportunity of raising a green manure, and of adding fertility to his land at trifling expense and with no harm to his trees.

Fall plowing may be advisable for farm crops, but not for orchards.

Only cultivated crops should be allowed in orchards early in the season. Grain and hay should never be grown.

In general level culture is best. The modern cultivators and harrows make such cultivation easy.

Trees, especially apples, are often trained too high, because of difficulty of working close; but modern tools permit the heads to be made low.

Harness with no projecting hames nor metal turrets should be used in bearing orchards. Those requiring no whiffletrees are also useful.

Potash is the chief fertilizer for fruit trees, particularly after bearing.

Potash may be had in wood ashes and muriate of potash. An annual application of potash should be made upon bearing orchards, of the muriate from

RAFFLE FOR 3 GIRLS.

A WISCONSIN FARMER THUS DISPOSES OF HIS DAUGHTERS.

They Agreed Prior to the Drawing and Will Keep Their Word—One Prize Drawn by a Married Man and Sold to a Widower For $50.

During the past few days the Finnish settlement, a few miles south of Maple, Wisconsin, has been in a state of great excitement over a remarkable succession of events. There are about two hundred residents in the settlement—all farmers, thrifty and nearly all in comfortable circumstances. There is a large surplus of unmarried young men in the community and a scarcity of marriageable young women, so that every female old enough to be courted receives the attention of from one to a dozen rival lovers. A widower named Hanes Dorfkie is one of the settlers, and has been living, since the death of his wife, with three pretty daughters in a little log house somewhat removed from the main settlement. Lately Dorfkie met with a number of reverses which crippled him financially. He had accumulated enough money since his residence there to pay for a forty-acre tract of farming land and to equip the farm with stock and the necessary implements for tilling the soil and harvesting the crops, but this year his crops were poor, his oxen died, and his poultry was carried away by hawks, so that while his neighbors saw plenty on hand to carry them through the coming long winter, the old man saw starvation looking into the faces of himself and three daughters. Something must be done, and the wary old Finlander set to thinking out a scheme for replenishing his depleted exchequer. At last an idea came to him, and he lost no time in shaping it into a lucrative scheme. He loved his three daughters, and they loved him dearly, but they had dozens of young men lovers, and sooner or later they would leave him to live the remainder of his days in poverty and loneliness. Why not realize something on his daughters? It was a good scheme, and he proceeded at once to carry it out.

The old man, Dorfkie, held a conference with his three daughters, and unfolded to them his plan for making money. He proposed at first to have an auction, and to sell them, one by one to the highest bidder, but the young women shrank from such a barbarous suggestion, though they signified their willingness to acquiesce in any legitimate scheme of money making that the father might devise. At last the old gent thought that it might be a good scheme to have a raffle, and so informed the three dutiful young women. They objected at first, on the ground that they might be obliged to accept men as their husbands who might be unsatisfactory to them, but when the father promised that the tickets should be sold to persons only who were acceptable in all respects, there was nothing left for the girls to do but to assent, and this they readily did.

So it was whispered about the neighborhood one day last week that Farmer Dorfkie had decided to raffle off his daughters, and the day later the whisperings were confirmed, for Mr. Dorfkie himself appeared among the people with a basketful of pasteboard cards, upon each of which the information was contained that the holder thereof was entitled to one chance on one or another of the three maidens fair. The tickets went like hot cakes at $1 apiece, and within a few days the loving father had exchanged his basketful of pasteboards for a like measure of shining silver and gold. In his anxiety to dispose of all the tickets, Mr. Dorfkie forgot his promise to discriminate in favor of the best-looking and most prosperous suitors in the settlement. He took everybody's dollar in exchange for a ticket, and the consequence was that every man in the village, married or single, rich or poor, homely or handsome, had possessed himself of one or more chances for the hand of one of the fair daughters long before the time set for the raffle.

The day came for the great event, and the schoolhouse was packed to the outer door with men, women and children. People in the neighboring towns had heard of the novel affair, and came from all directions to witness the final proceedings. Two hundred and fifty tickets upon each girl had been sold, and the arrangement was that each prize should be disposed of separately under the auspices of a committee selected out of the audience. Tickets numbered to correspond with those sold were placed in one box, and another box contained 249 blanks and one number marked "Prize." Two young girls were then selected to preside over the boxes, and the drawing commenced, the tickets being removed Cupid breaks his bow at the sight of a face full of pimples and blotches. Hollow cheeks, sunken eyes, and a sallow complexion will defy his best intentions. Beauty is more than skin deep. The skin is merely the surface on which is written in plain characters the condition of the body. The skin is not a thing by itself, and skin diseases are frequently not skin diseases at all. All the lotions and bleaches and creams and powders in the world won't make a good complexion if the digestion is wrong. If the stomach is sour, and the liver torpid, and the bowels constipated, the skin will show it. No use trying to treat the skin for such a condition. The only way to relieve it is to cleanse the system and purify the blood. As long as the heart is pumping impurities to every part of the body, just so long these impurities will show through the skin.

Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery is good for the complexion because it makes the whole body healthy—because it clears and purifies the blood, makes the digestion strong and clears out impurities of all kinds. By increasing the ability to assimilate nutritious food, and by the infusion of its own ingredients, it enriches the blood and so makes solid, healthy flesh. It fills out the hollows, rubs out wrinkles and substitutes for sallowness a rosy, healthy glow. There is no mystery about it. It isn't a miracle. It is merely the result of a combination of rational, natural common sense with expert medical knowledge. of earth. In this way the heads will keep perfectly sound all winter, and they can be easily taken up as wanted for shipping.

For family use cabbage can be kept in the same way, only it will not be necessary to make the second layer. It is quite important to keep them a little below the freezing point. It has been suggested to keep them in some convenient building, but this plan has always resulted in failure, as the dry atmosphere is fatal; cabbage must be kept moist and cool, the slightest wilting renders it unfit for the table.

Don't Wait For the Pullets.

It takes some farmers a long time to find out that they expend a large sum on experiments that should not be made, while they refuse to experiment when it should be done. One of the favorite experiments practiced on nearly all farms is that of keeping hens and pullets for several months with the expectation that they will soon begin to lay, and such fowls are thus carried over for two or three months, only to be sold in disgust at a time when they bring but little in market. When a dozen hens compose a flock, and but few eggs are secured, it is easily known which hens are the layers, as the red combs will indicate the profitable ones. If the combs are shriveled and have no color it is safe to look for no eggs for quite a time. To keep such hens with the belief that they will soon help to increase the number of eggs is to incur unnecessary expense, leaving out the fact that the unprofitable hens will become so deeply indebted to their owner that they cannot in the future remunerate him for their support.—Poultry Keeper.

A Practical Wheelbarrow.

In gardening there is much work that can be done with a wheelbarrow. While resting my aching arms one day, I concluded that the wheel of the ordinary barrow was not bearing its share of the burden, so I made one in which the axle was placed up nearer the body of the barrow, the wheel extending inside. A cap was fitted over this, inside the body, and I found that wheeling was then much easier. The new barrow weighed 49 pounds. With 239 pounds of sand, there is a weight of 56 pounds on the handles, while with the ordinary barrow the weight is 99 pounds. The handles are 5 feet long, 1 1-4x1 3-4

An Effectual Method.

The little boy whose parents had recently moved into the neighborhood was a human document; over his entire costume was written the fact that good clothes do not bring happiness. His sailor hat, his immaculate little trousers of duck and his neatly polished shoes were so obviously unsuited to the average juvenile temperament that two urchins paused to extend their sympathy.

"Hi, there, Jonny," said one of them; "tel yer mother we're goin' fishin' an' ask her will she lend you to us to lean over the boat an' charm the fish."

The boy with the sailor hat made no reply.

"Aw, let him alone," put in the other urchin. "I don't you see what's happened to him? His parents are tired of him an' have dressed him up purty an' stood him on t on the pavement so's he'll get kidnaped."

The subject of their remarks hung his sailor hat on the fence, took off his collar and necktie and, turning to the boys who had been gleefully admonishing him not to spoil his beauty, offered the simple inquiry:

"Want to fight?"

The challenge was promptly accepted, with the stipulation that each of the old residents was to refrain from taking a hand while the other was engaged with the stranger. In a short time both the local boys had announced that they had "had enough."

"Say, you feller," said one of them, as he wiped the dust off his sleeve, "you're a scrapper all right. But what makes you wear that kind of clothes?"

"It saves time," was the answer. "Mother and father are movers. They're never contented to stay in one part of town. They rent a different house every three or four months. It used to take two or three weeks of givin' an' takin' back-talk to get acquainted with the boys, so I got mother to buy me these clothes. She doesn't know yet what I wanted 'em for; she thinks I'm gettin' neat. All I have to do now when we move into a new neighborhood is to put 'em on. They make me look so easy that it only takes a day or two to get all my fightin' tended to an' get acquainted with the fellers an' have a good time."—Detroit Free Press.

Why They Parted.

Lenore tapped gently at the door.

The poet arose from his seat where he had been writing his justly celebrated poem, "The Raven."

He opened the door and gazing at her for a moment with a puzzled expression upon his face, said:

"'Sir,' said I, 'or madam, truly your forgiveness I implore'—"

Lenore turned and descended the stairs.

"'Sir, or madam,' indeed!" she said, with a petulant toss of her head. "I'll wear these bicycle bloomers whenever I please—so there!"

Combined Poultry and Dairying.

Prof. John A. Myers, director of the West Virginia Experiment Station, writes in Hoard's Dairyman:

"If we combine the dairy and poultry business, we make a most happy union, and I have often wondered that our dairymen do not place more emphasis upon poultry as a source of income.

"The poultry business requires no large amount of capital, and labor upon the farm that would otherwise be idle can very largely be utilized in caring for it. The same families that take the dairy products will be only too glad to get the poultry supplies, so that there is no additional expense in marketing the supplies. Every hen properly cared for can be expected to pay the owner at least one dollar net per year in eggs, and considerable additionally either in form of eggs or of chickens raised for sale. Considerable poultry can be kept largely upon what would otherwise be wastes of the dairy business. Buttermilk or skim milk fed to hens will pay better than used any other way with which I am acquainted. There are wastes about the dairy stable which cannot be utilized in any way as effectively as by poultry, which pick up the lost grain, whether in the manger or in the manure pile, and convert it into profit.

"Poultry properly handled gives the farmer a certain and ample income at the time of the year when dairymen are generally most anxious to have the deficiencies of the dairy made good, and there is never a time in the year when poultry products may not find a fair market.

"Much of the mixed food for dairy cattle is admirably adapted for feeding poultry; little additional building is necessary; no additional help is required.

"For myself I prefer the egg producing varieties to the all-purpose fowl, or fowl that is especially adapted for killing as meat. In the long run, I think the egg producers more profitable than the meat producers, and that is a question of taste, and the point is not to keep any fowls upon the farm that do not pay a profit to the owner. The man who expects to secure both qualities in a chicken is like the man who wants a good beef and a good dairy cow in the same animal. It is best to determine what a man wishes to do and work to that end."

Butter-Making Rules.

The instructor at Cornell Agricultural College, Ithaca, N.Y., has sent out a list of rules about butter making and ripening cream. He says:

"The practical part of cream ripening is this: Keep your vessel so that it all may ripen evenly, and thus avoid loss in churning. Raise the temperature to 62 degrees or 68 degrees and keep it as near that temperature as possible until ripe, and then cool before churning. Well ripened cream should be coagulated or thickened. It should run from a height in a smooth stream, like oil. When a paddle is dipped into it and held in the hand, it should stick all over in a thick coat, not running off in streaks and showing the surface of the paddle. When the last drops run off the paddle into the vat, they should leave little dents or depressions, on the surface, which do not close up for an instant. The cream should have a satin gloss or fresh surface. Churn until the granules are the size of wheat kernels, then draw off the buttermilk, and wash through two or three waters, whirling the churn a few times around. Use from a pint to a quart of water per pound of butter. Have the water at a temperature of 40 degrees to 45 degrees in hot weather, and from 50 degrees to 62 degrees in winter, always depending upon the season, natural solidity of the butter, warmth of the room and size of granules. If you do not care about feeding the washings, I would put some salt in my first wash water. It will help to float the granules better, and perhaps dissolve out the casein to some extent. I would generally salt the butter in the churn."

Dairy Suggestions.

Every cow should yield 6000 pounds of milk per annum.

Many a cow is doing her best to run her owner into a poorhouse; many another cow is paying off the mortgage. There are cows—and cows.

Fast milking seems to increase the per cent. of butter fat in the milk. This is the conclusion of the Wisconsin experiment station, but no explanation is given.

commenced, the tickets being removed from both boxes simultaneously until the lucky number drew the prize. For half an hour the audience sat in suspence, while the two girls slowly withdrew the numbers and compared them under the vigilant eyes of the committee men, but at last the number 115 was responded to by the exclamation "Prize!" and the first raffle was over. Then followed a wild skirmish for the owner of the lucky ticket, and when found he was carried to the front over the heads of a good-natured crowd. The holder of the winning ticket proved to be a thrifty young man of the settlement, who had long sought for the hand of the eldest daughter, Hulda, whose husband he was now to become.

Next came the raffle for the second daughter, a rosy-cheeked lass of twenty-two summers. This time the winning ticket was held by one of the richest men in the town, but, unfortunately, he was a married man with a large family. This caused a long delay in the proceedings, during which the entire audience entered into a heated discussion as to what disposition should be made of the ticket, but it was finally agreed that the lucky number should be sold at auction then and there. This was done, and, after considerable spirited bidding, Minnie, the second daughter, became the prospective bride of a middle-aged widower, who paid $50 for the prize.

Then came the raffle for the youngest daughter, and things were progressing smoothly enough, when an error was discovered which caused a bitter altercation between two ticket-holders, and came near precipitating a free-for-all fight among the spectators. Through carelessness the winning number had been duplicated, and there were two claimants for the hand of daughter No. 3. At length a general row was averted, however, by the adoption of a happy suggestion. The two claimants resorted to a game of "freeze-out" for a determination of the matter, and for two hours they sat at a card table, surrounded by an excited crowd of friends, manipulating the pasteboards for a bride. Slowly the stack of chips in front of the unlucky player dwindled to a paltry few, and at last his opponent swept the board, and the game was decided in favor of a young man named Gustav Johnson, who labors by the day on the farm of his father.

True to their promise the three daughters will allow themselves to be led to the altar by the three lucky winners, and the three weddings will take place within a month, upon which occasion a grand dance will be given in the schoolhouse to all the people of the settlement. —New York Times.

Rural Existence Delightful With Good Roads.

Wherever experiments in rural mail delivery have been made it has been found to work most successfully—during clear weather when the roads were all right, which indicates how indissolubly linked together are the problems of good roads and the uplift of the social life of the farm.

The time has come when the farmer must sit down to think out this question of good roads and how to get them. It is not an exaggeration to say that to the future of agriculture few things bear so important a relationship as does the question of good roads. Indeed, if the generation now growing up on the farm is to be kept on the farm, better social advantages will be found absolutely necessary, and what single thing could contribute so much as good roads to the elevation of life on the farm?

But the whole thing is being discussed in a desultory and indeterminate way, which promises nothing for the future. Organized effort, in which the wheelman of the town and the farmer of the country should stand shoulder to shoulder, must be put forth if substantial advance is to be made. With the harvests out of the way there should be set on foot a movement looking to this end.

With good roads farm life will have all the delights of rural existence, to which will be added the advantages of the town, or a daily mail, or social intercourse with neighbors, or musicales and lectures brought near. Good roads will transform the farm, which so many now desert for the city, into the most attractive of homes, and give once more to agriculture first place among the professions and occupations of life.—Farmer's Voice.

Keeping Cabbage.

The old plan of burying, or putting cabbages in trenches during winter, has become obsolete, and a more simple and easy plan has been adopted. Where cabbage is grown on a large scale for shipping purposes, the best plan is to lift the cabbage and stack them into tiers, deep and as closely as they can be placed in an orchard, or wood if convenient, and cover with leaves to the depth of two or three inches, the leaves to be kept in place by a slight covering inches at front and smaller towards the back. The wheel is 22 inches diameter with a 2-inch tire. The barrow frame is 19 inches at front, 2 feet at back; the body is 3 feet by 13 inches, while the legs are 2 feet 10 inches from the front.

Entrances to Fields.

In country road making there is much plowing of roadsides and scraping away of the surface soil. This is almost always a mistake. But the farmer should see to it that at least the work of road improvement does not obstruct the entrances to his fields. Making it easy for the farmer to use any part of his farm is for him about the most necessary part of road improvement. Out of this field into the road he will each year draw many loads, besides the loads of manure he will likely draw into it. If a plowed ridge or ditch obstructs the entrance to the field many wagons will be needlessly broken. If a ditch is required in the roadside opposite a gate, the path master may be obliged to convert it at that point into a sluiceway, with stone or tile passage for the water. An underdrain beside the road, three feet deep, with good outlet, is the best way to improve most poor roads. But whatever the method adopted, the farmer should see to it that road improvement does not obstruct gateways that he has to use.

A Story With a Moral.

One day recently, as a teamster was slowly working his way through the quagmire commonly known as a country road between the Cummings hill and Fossil, he espied a hat in one of the ruts in front of him. As the headgear appeared to be in fully good condition he dismounted to pick it up. As he raised the hat he was astonished to hear a voice from under it exclaim: "Hold on! That's my hat!" As soon as he had gathered his breath and wits the teamster asked: "What are you doing down there?" which brought forth the reply: "I'm in big luck to be where I am. There's a horse underneath me."—Fossil (Ore.) Journal.

To Break a Kicking Horse.

If you have a horse that is in the habit of kicking, put him in a narrow stall that has both sides thickly padded. Suspend a sack filled with hay or straw so that it will strike his heels, and let the horse and sack fight it out. Be sure to have things arranged so that the horse cannot hurt himself. The sack will be victorious every time, and in the end the horse will absolutely refuse to kick the sack or anything else.—Farmer's Review.

Arranging a Window Garden.

In arranging plants in the window garden, aim always to have the view from the room pleasing. They are for home adornment, and they should be most attractive from a home standpoint. A good general rule to follow for effectiveness in arrangement is to have the taller ones at the sides. This frames the window, and allows the sun to get at the centre of the group. If all the plants are sun-loving ones, dispose the low-growing ones next the glass, with the taller ones behind them. The use of swinging iron brackets at each side of the window frame is highly advisable from the standpoint if utility as well as looks. Those holding three pots enable one to arrange small plants of a drooping nature so that the effect is very fine. These brackets can be swung to or from the glass, and are preferable to shelves. —Eben E. Rexford, in Ladies' Home Journal.

A New Swindle.

A new swindle has been invented, and is being worked quite extensively in some sections. A farmer who wants to sell his place is called on by a smooth talking gentleman, who wants to sell the farm on a commission. He will put advertisements of the farm with attractive pictures in the leading papers, and charge a commission of five per cent when he sells the farm. The farmer signs a contract, and later on, when the farmer makes a sale of his farm through some other channel, the contract turns up, and it is found to read that the commission is payable whenever the farm is sold, no matter who has made the sale of it.

Attempt at Robbery.

As Mr. Robt. W. Denison was driving home on Saturday evening last, accompanied by two young ladies, he was attacked by three men whose evident intention was to rob. As the three occupants of the rig reached a lonely part of the road one of the robbers sprang up and caught the horse by the head, while a second demanded either Mr. Denison's money or his life. Mr. Denison offered to give the robber what little money he had but as he came up to get it Mr. Dennison grabbed him by the throat and threw him back. Meanwhile the third robber had come up on the other side of the rig and at this the other lady caught up the whip and struck the horse a blow. It sprang forward and loosened his grsp and also that of the other at his head. Mr. Denison was now able to drive on and although the robbers followed for a distance they soon gave up the chase.

Doesn't Want It Damaged.

"Talking about safe crackers" said Mr. J. M. Smith, License Inspector, of Tamworth, "they usually damage a safe pretty badly even if they don't effect an entrance, and for my part I don't believe there is an absolutely burg'ar proof safe. I never lock my safe now. I simply push the door closed and hang a card, containing the following words, on the handle; This safe is not locked. It contains no money and is used as a receptacle for books and papers of value to no one but the owner."

THE DOMINION BANK ROBBERY.

While no new developments have come to light in the bank robbery, it is now generally believed that the four men who were camped on Hawley's Point during July and August were the prepetrators of the deed. The detectives on the case have devoted considerable time in an endeavor to discover the owner of the screw driver found near the partition through which the robbers effected an entrance. It is a crude home-made affair with a wooden handle.

The detectives affect to make light of the tramp theory. All the well-known bank robbers are known to the police they say and if the four men in question were professionals they would have taken greater pains to conceal their identity. They allege that the combination on the safe was not mastered by an expert manipulator, but that it was opened by one who in some manner became acquainted with the combination.

The following from the Halifax Chronicle of Sept. 22nd may or may not prove of value. The fact that one of the "Hawley Point tramps" who was brought before Police Magistrate Daly gave out that he came from New Brunswick might go to show that he was none other than Bell. The following is the extract from the Chronicle:

"The indentification and capture of robbers comes about sometimes in a very curious way, as the case related below will show. One night about six years ago a stranger went into the town of Newcastle, N. B., and the next morning he disappeared. During the night, the safe in James Fish & Co's premises at Newcastle was burglarized and $700 taken therefrom.

I. C. R. Detective Skeffington went to work on the case, and sent a telegram to River du Loup, giving a description of the stranger, and the county constable and I. C. R. police officer there found him on one of the trains and when searched he had the stolen money in his posession. He was brought to Newcastle, convicted and sentenced to five years in Dorchester. He gave his name as Bell and was said to be well connected. After serving eighteen months of his sentence he made his escape from the penitentiary and had not been heard of again until a few weeks ago. It came out at the trial that he had spent four hours working at Fish's safe, until he got the combination that opened it.

It will be remembered that three weeks ago despatches were published about the robbery of the Dominion bank at Napanee, Ontario, and of $30,000 having been taken, under similar circumstances as the robbery at Fisk's. The strange part of the story is that Detective Skeffington on reading the despatches pitched at once upon Bell, and sent a full desription and a photo of him to E. H. Baines, the manager of the Dominion Bank. Word has been received back that Bell is undoubtedly one of the principals, as he was seen in company with three others near the bank on the day of the robbery. It is rather curious that his identity should have been made from Moncton, which is so many hundred miles away."

One of our citizens, who was at the station to meet the midnight train on the night of the robbery, was accosted by two men, a tall and a short one, who inquired the shortest and best route to New York City.

The Pinkerton detectives are still in town, and startling developments are expected shortly.

Not putting much faith in the story I interviewed William Henry Smith this morning, a gentleman of unimpeachable character, who gave me the following for publication, Safe Crackers at Tamworth.

On Tuesday night burglars broke into W. D. Mace's office at Tamworth and made an unsuccessful attempt to crack his safe. The office adjoins Mr. Mace's grist mills. An entrance was gained by prying open the window. The safe is a burglar proof one, and although the robbers drilled several holes in it and applied powerful explosives the massive doors were proof against their efforts. Failing in their efforts to blow open the safe the robbers adjourned to a nearby blacksmith shop and secured several chisels, a hammer and some other tools. Thus equipped they attempted to pry open the safe doors and did succeed in moving them a trifle, but finally desisted from their efforts. The safe is a double door affair and opens with a key. The prying and explosives have warped and twisted the locks so that it cannot be opened and probably the services of an expert will have to be called in. The safe contained no money but all Mr. Mace's books and papers are enclosed in it. Lying exposed by the window through which the robbers gained an entrance was a cash box containing about $12 in silver. This was overlooked by the burglars in their eagerness to get into the safe. Mr. Mace recently came to the conclusion that a safe is about the unsafest place in which to keep money and quietly placed his money in his pocket when he closed up his office on Tuesday evening. Mr. Mace's dog, a supposedly good watch dog, was left in the office but he made no manifestations during the night. Five safes have been successfully cracked in Tamworth within the past few years. The question now arises was it the work of professionals or local men? The majority favor the professional theory.

Foot Ball, Newburgh vs N. C. I.

A game of football was played in Newburgh between the above teams on Tuesday, p.m., in which the N. C. I. was defeated by 2 to 0. The N. C. I. forwards did not play the game they should have played on account of some of the players not keeping their position. If the captain set an example the forwards would be greatly benefitted by it. The boys speak highly of their treatment by the Newburgh boys and also of the brilliant combination of the Newburgh forwards. E. W. Grange referred the game to the entire satisfaction of all. The teams lined up as follows:

N. C. I.		NEWBURGH.
McCoy,	goal	Lochhead,
Fretz,	backs	Shannon,
Hall,		Wood,
Burrows,	half backs	McKim,
Nixon,		Mathewson,
Hawley,		Gandier,

A practice game was played on Wednesday, between the town and the school teams, the former being successful by 2 to 1. As the town had their strongest team the Collegiate boys had one of the best and hardest games yet. The town team was composed of the following: Ponton, Smith, Durand, Coates, Parker, Hayes, Stevens, Grieve, Wagar, E. Grange, W. Grange. H. Ashley referred the game satisfactorily.

NOTES.

Our Newburgh correspondent sends us the following notes of the game played between the Napanee Collegiate Institute foot ball team and the Newburgh club on the grounds of the latter on Tuesday.

Murphy played the game of the day for Newburgh. He is a first class man at the business.

Mathewson, Lochhead and Shannon put up an excellent game for Newburgh.

Hall is the star of Napanee's team.

What combination Napanee had was of a very swift nature.

Both teams showed very little practice as little or no combination was played at all.

The boys of Napanee took their defeat like gentlemen.

A return match is supposed to be played in Napanee some evening next week.

Don't fail to see the game between Newburgh and Deseronto on Saturday, Oct. 2nd.

An Exciting Experience.

As Mrs. Alfred Knight and Miss Hawley, Toronto, were driving along the Newburg road, they met with rather an exciting experience. They had two horses, Mr. Knight's fancy cream team One of the horses stumbled and fell, dragging the other down with it. The horse that was pu led down rolled completely over its companion. One can imagine the state of affairs better than they can describe them. The ladies showed remarkable presence of mind, and when help arrived were trying to extricate the horses. The neckyoke was broken and one or two small straps.

Death of Mrs. Leary.

Mary Hurd Kendall, relict of the late Benjamin Leary, and one of the oldest residents of Napanee, passed over to her reward on the 24th ult., at the ripe old age of eighty six years. Deceased was born in Yorkshire, England, in 1811, and came to this country with her parents in 1818, settling at Kingston. She was married at Kingston to her late husband, who preceeded her to the grave about seven years ago, in 1888. Six children was the result of this union, three boys, George, of Watertown, James, of Winnipeg, and Brock, of Napanee, and three girls, Mrs. W. S. Pringle and Jas. Blair, of Napanee, and Mrs. Miles Pringle, of Duluth. Deceased has resided in Napanee for the past fifty-five years and was universally respected for her many estimable qualities and kindness of heart. She was a great friend of the sick and afflicted and leaves many warm friends to mourn her loss. Since the death of her husband she resided with her daughter, Mrs. W. Pringle, from whose residence the funeral took place on Saturday to the Eastern Cemetery. The rervices were conducted by the Rev. Dr. Crothers, of the Eastern Methodist church, of which body deceased was a consistent member. The remains were followed to their last resting place by a large concourse of friends.

Address and Presentation.

Mr. A. E. Lang, B. A., ex-modern language master of the Napanee Collegiate Institute, was pleasantly surprised on Thursday evening of last week by a number of the senior pupils of the Collegiate, who waited upon him and presented him with the following address and a handsome sterling silver inkstand and a gold pen. The address was read by Mr. G. E. Hall and the presentation was made by Mr. W. G. Pruyn.

NAPANEE, SEPT. 23rd, 1897.

Dear Mr. Lang:—

We, the Napanee Board of Education, and the teaching staff, and present and former senior classes of the Napanee Collegiate Institute, view with sincere regret the severance of your connection with the Institute. For the past eight years by your faithful devotion to duty and your exemplary demeanor, you have not only placed your department in the foremost rank and acquired for yourself a most enviable reputation as a teacher, but you have also won the merited esteem and affection of all those whose privilege and pleasure it has been to associate with you. That your scholarly attainments are appreciated elsewhere is manifest by your recent appointment to the lectureship of Modern Languages in your own Alma Mater. Our sorrow in parting with you is not unmixed with gladness when we contemplate this deserved promotion, and with a pride born of confidence in your ability and gentlemanly instincts we predict for you a most successful career in Victoria University. In parting we beg of you to accept from us this inkstand and pen, which we trust will often remind you of your Napance friends, whose most earnest prayer is that prosperity and happiness may attend both you and Mrs. Lang in your new sphere of life.

Signed, A. Chinneck,
A. Reid,

would have gone twenty five miles to have seen it."

"What are the facts?"

"Well, I live on lot twenty-five in the fifth concession, Ernesttown. My mother-in-law, Mrs. Lawrence Hartman, a respected lady of eighty-two years, lives at my house. Yesterday, Sunday morning, I went down to uncle Joseph Smith's York Road, and when I returned home grandma told me, and it was corroborated by the other members of my household, that the feather bed (a big heavy one), the bedding and pillows had rolled off the bedstead to the floor, and that they had replaced them in apple-pie order, turned their backs and heard a rustle. They returned quickly to see the feather bed, etc., rolling together and landing on the floor again. A dozen times this was repeated in broad daylight. Then we removed the straw mattress and tried the feather bed again, but off she'd come. A testament was brought and laid on top of the bed. The feather bed cringed and wriggled and finally dropped on the floor again.

"Bring the big family bible,' said I, and that was placed on top of the bed. By-and-by the feathers became uneasy, a few mighty upheavals failed to dislodge the bible; the feathers tickled the corners of the tick, and they folded over the book, but that's all it could do. The bible taken off again, the feather bed went at ths per formance as usual, and kept it up all day.

"Night came and I said to the folks, 'make up that thing and I'll hold 'er down to-night or tumble off on the floor with it.' So after all the objections were prevented and over-ruled, they made the feather bed and before it had time to get a wrigle on I was on it, holding it down in good shape. I wasn't a bit timid and beyond being awakened once in a while, by the corners of the tick, tickling my face, I enjoyed a comfortable night's rest and had the feather bed under me at daylight Monday morning, but as soon as I got up the bed tumbled out too. I havn't been home for an hour or so and can't say how it is acting since I came down town. Yes sir, this is true, every word of it. The bedroom is immediately off the sitting room."

Mr. Smith is a well-known, well-to-do farmer, whose word is A 1 in the township and with everyone acquainted with him. Besides this Mr. and Mrs. James Johnston, near neighbors of Mr. Smith, and also people of high standing, were eye witnesses. It will be recalled that some years ago Mrs. Hartman's husband died suddenly in St. Alban's church during revival services. Who can explain the occurence?

Supernatural Eggs.

Apropos of the "feather bed manifestations" near Odessa, a citizen of Napanee, relates a somewhat parallel incident which occurred near Portland a number of years ago. The gentleman in question was visiting some friends in that vicinity at the time, when a wonderful egg was unearthed by one of the neighbor's children. The shell of the egg contained well-formed raised letters setting forth the date of the millenium. The people of the neighborhood jumped to the conclusion at once that the end of the world was in sight and prepared to get their house in order. These wonderful eggs turned up with regularity and dispatch for several days and each inscription bore a reference to the second coming. On his return to town the citizen came across an article in a newspaper which explained the mystery that had been agitating the good people of Portland. All that is necessary to manufacture these supernatural eggs is to mark the letters you desire to make on the shell with a piece of tallow, place the egg in vinegar for a while and it will emerge with the letters nicely raised on the shell.

OBITUARY.

WAGAR.

Maud Miller, daughter of Thomas and Elizabeth Miller, was born in Camden County Lennox and Addington Ont., Jan. 3rd 1865. She was converted to God in very childhood and was a life long member of the Methodist church. She was happily married on the 12th January 1887 to her now bereaved husband Marshall C. Wagar, of Camden, who walked with her in mutual affection the ways of righteousness, the paths of peace. Their union was blessed by one daughter little Gertrude. Her short illness of two days duration was fraught with extreme suffering occasioned by brain fever. All her religious life of joy, love and victory seemed to reach a climax of holy triumph as she passed through the furnace of affliction on Thursday 9th Sept. She fell asleep in Jesus and was buried in the Centreville cemetery. The occasion was improved by Rev. J. S. McMullen preaching to a very large concourse of friends from Rev. 14—13. All were visibly affected and a deep solemnity pervades the community attesting the influence of a sweet disposition, loving character and consistent life. The church has lost one of its purest members and best workers. Sympathy is extended to the stricken husband and relatives who sorrow but have a hope of a glorious resurrection.

THE FUNNY ENGLISHMAN.

Some of the Pranks He Plays on His Unsuspecting Victims.

To successfully annoy a policeman is quite one of the little arts. Try this: Go up to the Bobby and say, "Please can you direct me to such and such an address?" To which Bobby answers, "Go straight down there, take the first turning to the right, the second to the left and the first to the right again." You are stupid. You do not comprehend. Bobby complies with your request to repeat it. "Thanks. Then, to start with, I go straight in that direction?" (This with an air of respectful, trembling humility.) "Yes, sir." Then walk off bang in the other direction.

And here is a new way of aggravating mathematicians. Say to your victim: "Think of a number; double it; multiply it by 9; add 165; subtract 17; divide it by 22; add 365," and so on until the man begins to get impatient. Then say to him, "Well, you have arrived at a certain result?" "Yes." "Well, divide that figure by a similar figure and I think you will find the result is 1."

Which reminds me of a simply horrid game for ladies I once invented. Here it is: "Think of your age; multiply it by 2, and then you get your real age."

And here is something for poor old cabby: You hail him in Regent street and show him a piece of paper with "Charing Cross station" written on it. "Bloece gan you dake me to zat address, gabman?" you say. "Right, sir," he answers. Arrived at Charing Cross station you alight. "How moch voz dat, bleece, gabman?" you ask naively. "'Alf a sovereign, sir." "Right. There's a shilling for you, you lying old scoundrel!" But don't do it to a very aged cabman. He may fall off his box.

I will conclude with a piece of advice—a warning. Without doubt the person best adapted for the profession of a practical joker is a champion of the racing track. The man who lacks that fleetness of foot, and yet wishes to practical joke, had better wear at least treble-seated trousers.—

THE ROB

When a man has reached the ripe age of 97 he has a pardonable pride in making a century run and a laudable ambition to end his days with an even record. As a general thing, however, the man or woman who reaches those years has lost both pride and ambition which make an effort at living on a possibility. This is not the case with one respected nonagenarian who lives in Detroit, Mich., and whose age is coincidental with the year, he being born in 1800. Capt. Francis Martin, U.S.N., has lived along easily without any thought of perpetuating his days beyond the average record of man, until, having passed the ninety-seventh milestone, he looks not forward, but lives in the present or busies himself with memories—and Capt. Martin's memories are worth much to their possessor. He is the only man now living who was at Napoleon Bonaparte's funeral on the lonely island of St. Helena. He has sailed into nearly every navigable port on the face of the globe up to the year 1830. He was the friend of Audubon, the famous ornithologist. He fought pirates on the high seas in 1824. In 1836 he took part in the Seminole Indian war. In 1832, after making a record as a master of sailing craft on both sides of the Atlantic, Capt. Martin entered the United States marine service, receiving his first commission from Andrew Jackson. In the following year he was stationed at Charleston, S.C., during the exciting times of nullification. He participated in the Mexican war, his cutter being part of the blockading fleet cruising off the Mexican ports.—Chicago Times-Herald.

Throwing Rice and Slippers.

The dainty slipper has been transformed into the old shoe of doubtful origin, and thrown with force and accuracy, causing no end of discomfort. And this is what two pretty customs have degenerated into. They have been vulgarized, and, therefore, the sooner they pass into disuse the better. The sentiment of the customs has been lost. Rice and shoes are no longer omens of good luck. The modern thrower of them has transformed them into missiles with which to annoy and mortify the bridegroom. The better class of people have already begun to substitute a shower of rose petals, and this new and far more beautiful idea is rapidly being followed. We might have preserved the old customs, but we have not. Henceforth, promiscuous rice throwing and the casting of old shoes at weddings will be left to the boors of our modern society, into whose hands these acts have fallen, and who seem happiest when they can convert the graceful customs of olden times into practical jokes.—Ladies' Home Journal.

A Few Facts About Garlic.

About three-quarters of the garlic used in this country is imported from Italy. It comes in hampers containing about 110 pounds each. Garlic is raised in scattered sections of this country. All garlic, both imported and Canadian, is put up in strings or bunches, something like the bunches in which onions were once commonly sold in this country, but much longer.

Garlic is sold by the pound or by the single bulb, which is sold for a penny. In its commercial form, whole and dry, garlic does not yield the strong smell for which it is famous. In a wholesale produce establishment, where garlic was stacked up in quantities, there was no noticeable odor from it. But if one of the several smaller bulbs of which each root is composed, and which are called cloves of garlic, be broken off and be broken in two, the powerful odor becomes perceptible.

The aggregate consumption of garlic in this country is on the increase.

Cry to our fatherland,
"Strike at the foe!"
Call on each noble band,
"Strike at the foe!"
Wailings are rising from alleys and lanes,
Finding sad echo in valleys and plains,
Thrilling our hearts and inflaming our veins—
Strike, strike, strike at the foe!
Strike, strike, strike at the foe!
Strike at the demon drink, blow upon blow!
Strike while the eye and the heart are aglow!
Strike, strike, strike at the foe!

Heroes of fatherland,
Strike at the foe!
This is a struggle grand.
Strike at the foe!
Sorrow stands watching with grief reddened eyes,
Poverty chants her low chorus of sighs,
Many voiced misery fearfully cries,
"Strike, strike, strike at the foe!"
Strike, strike, strike at the foe!
Strike at the demon drink, blow upon blow!
Strike and go forward and strike as you go!
Strike, strike, strike at the foe!

Patriots of fatherland,
Strike at the foe.
Fight with an iron hand.
Strike at the foe!
Commerce stands waiting for victory's hour.
Heaven is ready rich blessing to shower.
Virtue, once weak, will rise in her power.
Strike, strike, strike at the foe!
Strike, strike, strike at the foe!
Strike at the demon drink, blow upon blow!
Strike, fiercely strike! Be not fitful nor slow.
Strike, strike, strike at the foe!

Statesman of fatherland,
Strike at the foe!
Shrink not, but firmly stand.
Strike at the foe!
Christians, arise in your terrible might.
Soldiers of temperance, the end is in sight.
Brothers, be cowards no longer, but fight.
Strike, strike, strike at the foe!
Strike, strike, strike at the foe!
Strike at the demon drink, blow upon blow!
Strike, resting not till the curse is laid low!
Strike, strike, strike at the foe!

That Odessa Feather Bed.

The services of the servant girl until recently employed in the house Henry A. Smith, in the Township of Ernestown, having been dispensed with, the evil spirits said to have haunted the house particularly a feather bed, appear to have taken their departure also, and the household is at rest. The girl was about twelve years of age, and of a mischievous disposition, it is said. No one, with the exception of the girl, ever witnessed the mysterious gyrations of the now famous feather bed. It did its hocus focus work when unobserved. An Odessa correspondent commenting on the inherent superstition of intelligent people shows that

In Sweden a crime is an event; theft, particularly, is very rare, says The Parisian. Honesty is the fundamental quality of the race, is naturally recognized and officially counted upon. In this regard the Stockholmers show a confident carelessness which is always a surprise to strangers and causes them some uneasiness. In the theatres and concert halls there are large cloak rooms, where hats and furs are left without the smallest safeguard; the performance over, each one again takes possession of his effects, and an accident never occurs. The inhabitants are accustomed to expect a reciprocal probity in the transactions of everyday life. Upon most of the tramways in Stockholm conductors have been dispensed with. The passenger himself deposits his ten ore in a little till placed at the end of the vehicle, behind the driver. It is patriarchal—and economical.

But to change the subject and talk about onions, as a certain member of your staff once wrote of Indians, we had an invitation to a "topping bee" the other evening and lest you puzzle over it as we did, we will inform you that this particular recreation means topping onions. Your old friend, Mr. Edgbert Sills, formerly of Lennox county, has raised this year on his farm in Sophiasburgh a very large amount of very fine onions and thither we made our way in response to the summons, to see the men "top." It was great sport, especially for the two young ladies, who were quite proficient in the art of throwing onions at some naughty boys. The scene brought to mind stories we have heard of the early pioneer days when neighbors banded together and assisted in building a newcomer a house, or helped each other in very many ways. A bundle of sticks bound together are much stronger than one, so it is with willing hands. Country life abounds with many such homely gatherings, but the merriment and general feeling of good fellowship has the ring of the true metal, such as is seldom found amid city gatherings even though they be so much more highly cultured that in comparison the country amusements would seem like a very insignificient star beside the brilliant sun.

correspondent commenting on the inherent superstition of intelligent people shows that the belief in witchcraft is not confined to the middle ages by relating the following stories which are told by people in that neighborhood: A farmer went out to pasture one fine summer morn to find one of his best cows sitting on her haunches, her shoulders braced in the air by her fore legs and bewitched, and no power could move her to the upright. She died. She did. Think of that. And yet another on this same prolific ground. A woman in Napanee took a fancy to a beautiful boy baby of tender days and wished its mother to accept as a present for the child a quarter of a dollar. The mother accepted. That night the child was taken with cramps in its little insides and could not be pacified by any of the many cordials, or honied tootsy-wootsy talk of a fond and loving mother. Next night, an old woman, lips sealed to the extent of mum, sneaked in and stole a garment peculiar to babyhood, took it out in the kitchen, wrung it out dry in a tin pan, built a rousing fire in the stove and commenced to boil the sap down. The fire was so great that the water was scorched and finally the bottom of the pan was burned up by the fervent heat. Next day word was received that the Napanee woman was dead, died such a horrible death by burning that friends were not allowed to view the remains. The baby? Yes, I almost forgot the child—got better and lived to a ripe old age. Now when reliable people stand up and rehearse such tales in a manner you cannot even doubt their sincerity, is it any wonder, I ask, that witchcraft still plays prank and has a jolly time once in a while? My paper's out and so's my pipe. Good evening.

would take the position and its responsibilities if accompanied by such unsavory attachments which surrounded Sir Charles.

And now could one but look into the inner reflections of the Hon. George Eulas to-day, how intensely chagrined the thoughts and how melancholy the musings of that gentleman would appear. His hopes, like his aspirations, took lofty flight when it became a well-understood fact that Sir Charles decided to resign the leadershsp and turn his attention to other and more profitable business. So apparent became Foster's imitations at indifference in the matter, his ill-concealed longing to succeed to the tory leadership became the subject of remark on the floor of the House. Commenting on the attitude of the Conservative leader and his lieutenant, Sir Richard Cartwright jocularly said in the course of a speech: "I do not know what their domestic arrangements are, but for the sake of all acquaintance, I would say to the opposition Cæsar, that he had better take care of his honorable friend (Foster).

"Yon Cassius is a lean and hungry man, Trust him not Cæsar, he is dangerous."

And thus it transpires that Sir Richard's anticipations are being realized; but the plum Foster would pluck is Dead Sea fruit.

A MOMENT OF TERROR.

It was a sweetly sacred hour; the light
Threw soft electric radiance o'er her head.
Without, the moon-cast shadows of the night
Weird outlines o'er the face of nature spread.
We sat upon the sofa side by side,
One of her shapely hands close clasped in mine.
The very air we breathed seemed sanctified
With whisp'rings of a love almost divine.

No longer could I curb my heart's desire
To tell the story which she longed to hear,
And, with a soul ablaze with heavenly fire,
I whispered my confession in her ear.
I heard the beatings of her startled heart,
And from her sweetest lips fell my whispered name;
Then, as if stung by adder, did she start,
And great convulsions seemed to rack her frame!

She writhed as if in agonizing pain,
Her face distorted in a frightful way,
Her form convulsed again and yet again,
And loud I shrieked for help in my dismay!
I begged her speak—I cried, "What shall I do?"
Her tight-clinched hands in sore affright I seized,
Then, with a wild, ear-shattering "Achoo-co oo!"
She sneezed!

Richness of the Tin Horn, Camp Fairview and the Prospects of the District.

An Interview with Mr. Russell, of the Firm of Dier, Davidson & Russell.

R Russel, of Hamilton, Ont., a member of the firm of Dier, Davidson & Russell, is just back from a trip through Fairview district, where the firm have large interests. Like all who have visited this famous camp, Mr. Russell is extremely enthusiastic regarding its great mineral wealth and its magnificent future. A Times representative ran across Mr. Russell this morning, and that gentleman had much of interest to say regarding his trip.

"Fairview is one of the liveliest mining camps in British Columbia today," said Mr. Russell. "Dozens of properties are being actively developed, buildings are going up on every hand, population is coming in, and a general air of prosperity pervades the camp. I have not the slightest doubt that Fairview will be one of the leading towns in the province in the no distant future. So much confidence has our firm in the permanency of the camp and its future that we have decided to close our Victoria office and locate the head office in Fairview. This we will do in about a month's time. Handsome office quarters are now in course of erection."

"How is the much-talked-off Tin Horn mine showing up? We hear a great deal about that property on the coast."

"The Tin Horn," replied Mr. Russell, "bids fair to prove the greatest gold producer in British Columbia. Unless all available evidence is wrong, unless all knowledge and theory regarding minerals is valueless, the Tin Horn will take that position among the mines of this province. Just here I wish to correct a statement appearing in the Rosslander and reproduced in the Times regarding the Tin Horn. Instead of there being 500 feet of work done on the Tin Horn, as stated, 1,000 feet is the correct figure. Then, again, there are about 10,000 tons of ore on the dump.

"The last finishing touches are being put on the mill, and it is expected to start running about the 1st of October next. We have heard it remarked that this is a 'boom' property. Now it may be mentioned that not one share of promoters' stock is for sale, nor would any of the holders take $5 for it. Parties desirous of purchasing Tin Horn stock have been repeatedly disappointed, none being for sale at any price. The property is looking better every day. An assay of ore taken across one of the tunnels by me gave an average estimate of $213 to to the ton.

"Work is proceeding night and day on the Comstock and Mammoth claims 500 feet of work having already been done by the company handling these properties. On the Joe Dandy claim a steam hoist has been installed, and I understand that a contract has been let for a 20-stamp mill.

"On the Winchester night and day shifts are being worked. Two shafts, one 55 feet and the other 50 feet, have been completed; a tunnel has been run to a distance of 27 feet, and about 25 feet of stoping has been done. A great amount of ore of great richness is in sight. The directors are about sending a large quantity of Winchester ore to Denver for the purpose of having it tested as to its suitability for treatment in the Beam furnace. If the furnace will do what is claimed for it,

THE DAIRY.

Cheese and Buttermaking at the Mapleton, Ont, Factory.

One of the noteworthy tendencies in the older cheesemaking sections of the Province of Ontario is for factories originally started and conducted under joint stock company auspices, the patrons being stockholders and directors, to pass into the hands of private individuals, frequently progressive makers themselves, who, however, still enjoy the mutual co-operation of boards of officers, including secretary, treasurer, auditor, and the like. During the stringent times of the past farmers in some instances required for other purposes the funds which they had so invested, and were not loath to let factory enterprise be assumed financially and managed by the factoryman or maker. In other cases we find groups of factories under the management of one individual employing makers, and who, if he is not now actually engaged as such, has had the experience and is therefore capable of overseeing properly what is being done. In such cases he is able to act as salesman and give more constant and watchful attention to that important branch of the business, one, by the way, requiring closer study every year owing to the critical demands of the trade. Whatever the final result may be, so far as our own observation goes, the tendency above referred to is in the direction of improved factories and appliances, and at the present time we find it going hand in hand with the winter dairying movement; that is to say, buttermaking in winter on the same premises where cheesemaking is the business of summer. During a recent visit to the county of Elgin, Ont., the writer came across, in the Mapleton factory, a very good example of the results of intelligent and progressive individual management, which is having a wholesome and benefi-

GRENIER has been found guilty of libeling Mr. Tarte. A few months ago the Tory press teemed with double leaded articles setting forth how Mr. Tarte was afraid to meet his accuser and had gone to Winnipeg to avoid the trial. Tory editors have been working overtime on their imagination trumping up charges and insinuations against the Minister of Public Works, on a par with the Grenier articles, which were the out come of personal spleen.

THE Public Schools are being starved and neglected and are nothing more than moulds in which candidates for the High Schools are pressed out in the plaint of Mr. Whitney. In 1871 Sandfield Macdonald spent on Public, Separate and Poor Schools $178,975, while in 1897 the same class of schools will receive from the Hardy Government $312,938, an increase of 74 per cent, while the increase in the number of pupils has been only 9 per cent. The High Schools in 1871 received $69,986, and in 1897 they will receive $100,000, an increase of 43 per cent., while the number of pupils has increased 229 per cent. Poor Whitney has a hard row to hoe and could be better engaged than in running down our Public School system, which is admittedly the best in the world.

OUR OTTAWA LETTER.

EXIT SIR CHARLES?

The opposition press of this city, a couple of days ago, announced that the real purpose of Sir Charles Tupper's visit to Winnipeg, just now was to transfer the leadership of the Conservative party to the Hon. Hugh John Macdonald. This announcement is made upon the authority of a statement by a prominent and well-informed Conservative, who says that the matter is already settled, and that a gathering of the party leaders in Winnipeg, during the present week, will confirm his assertion. The retirement of Sir Charles is not at all an unlooked-for event. It was well known that after his crushing defeat at the polls, his one desire was to finally withdraw from active political life and to see his mantle of the tory leadership fall upon the shoulders of his son, the member for Pictou.

In this particular his ambition has received another check. It was Foster's spare form and elongated visage which obtruded their unwelcome presence into the little scheme, and so the plan for the continuance of Tupper aggrandizement fell to pieces. Foster's claims for leadership could not thus lightly be set aside for those of this scion of the Tupper nobility. So it was decreed that Foster's ambition, likewise, should not attain its desired end, and Hugh John is put forward as a makeshift. Reliance is placed upon the old-time prestige of his father's name and memory, together with that of his own honorable career and character, which Hugh John will bear with him, to bring into temporary unison, at least, the discordant elements of the party. But it will certainly be found necessary, sooner or later, for this new tory leader, if he would command the respect of parliament and the confidence of the country, to purge his party from the degrading element which now destroys the utility of Her Majesty's loyal opposition in the Canadian parliament. Hugh Macdonald may, if he accepts the leadership, succeed in obtaining a competent and respectable following, but it would need to be an entirely new one. It bacteriologists who have directed their attention to stringy milk have arrived at the same conclusion—viz., that it is caused by bacteria. These investigations have also brought to light the fact that several forms of bacteria may cause stringy milk, and that stringy milk cannot be produced without infection. In Norway and Sweden a certain class of "stringy milk," called "lange milk," is sold as an article of commerce, and this milk is said to be produced by feeding the cows on a particular plant. Tests made by bacteriologists did not, however, produce such an effect, and at the present time all evidence seems to point to every case being the result of infection.

The bacillus which is supposed to be the principle cause of stringy milk has been found by Guillbeau to retain its vitality in September in a sample of milk to which it had been inoculated in March. It is generally supposed to live on the floors, walls and air of the byre, on the udders and bodies of the cows, and on the vessels which hold the milk or by which it is carried. It is said to be very difficult to kill, and nothing but the most scrupulous cleanliness in everything, from the cow to final delivery of the milk, including milker's hands and clothes, will get rid of it. While in Switzerland in 1894 at the conference of the British Dairy Farmers' Association, I had a conversation with Professor Freudenreich on this subject, and he said that the bacillus of this complaint was probably more common in Switzerland and Norway than in any other country. At one of the conferences in Berne he showed those present samples of milk, all from one pure source twelve hours before, each of which had been inoculated with a different cultivation of some bacillus causing trouble in the dairy. He dipped his pencil into the milk to which a cultivation of this bacillus had been added, and when lifted up, the milk, by simple adhesion, was drawn out into a string one to two feet long. Later on, in his laboratory, I had an opportunity of seeing other samples of good and bad bacteria which are commonly found associated with dairying, and heard from him the extreme difficulty of ridding a byre or dairy of this bacillus.

While warm weather enables this bacillus to increase, it should also give your correspondent a favorable opportunity of thoroughly disinfecting his whole premises, cows, utensils and people. Lime wash, with some strong disinfectant, should be freely used; the dairy utensils should be thoroughly steamed or boiled longer than usual, for several days successively; the cows' udders and bodies should be washed with some weak disinfectant; the clothing of the milkers and those handling the milk should be entirely renewed; and the milkers' hands washed after every cow. If these precautions are carefully carried out, the mischief may reasonably be expected to be got rid of.

furnace will do what is claimed for it, one will be placed as soon as possible on the Winchester, as the ore from the claim is the richest in the camp, and it would pay for a plant in a few months."

The directors of the Winchester have bonded a very valuable property and are likely to combine it with the Winchester, and it would be an important addition to the company's holdings. Should the property be acquired Winchester shares will immediately be advanced to 50.

"The people of the coast," continued Mr. Russell, "have no idea of the extent to which the fame of Camp Fairview has spread. While I was there four parties with experts came in. One was from Johannesburg and another from Germany, the latter representing an English syndicate.

"An English company is now vigorously developing the Black Prince and Exchange claim, and the Tin Horn ledge has been struck on the latter at a distance of 25 feet. The experts are jubilant over the prospects of the camp. The country all around for miles has been staked.

"As an evidence of the confidence we have in Fairview I may point to our fine new hotel now rapidly approaching completion. The building is of fine appearance and the most modern appliances will be included in its interior fittings. The electric light wires are now being installed. There will be 33 bedrooms: the dining room, billiard room, etc., are large and spacious.

Reverting again to the Tin Horn, Mr. Russell said: "If the mine turns out as we expect shares will be worth $12 in six months."—Victoria, B. C., Daily Times.

MENTAL VISION.

Marvelous Sight Which Has Been Partially Recognized by Science.

At the meeting of the British Iron and Steel Association, held at Cardiff, Wales, in the first week of August, a paper showing a great amount of original research entitled "The Diffusion of Sulphides through Steel" was presented by an American chemist, Mr. E. D. Campbell, of Ann Arbor, Michigan. The president of the association in announcing the paper, which was accepted as read, and is printed in full in the English technical papers, said; "Mr. Campbell is an eminent American chemist, who has done most wonderful work considering the position in which he is placed, because he is blind. His researches were really, under the circumstances, simply marvelous."

It is curious, in view of the information imparted by the president of the British Association, to notice in reading this paper of the blind chemist how frequently he speaks of seeing phenomena, as though favored with normal vision. In one experiment he placed a piece of steel in a furnace, which he provided with a peep hole, in order that the operations could be constantly watched, and thus the piece could be withdrawn at the critical moment. There are several tables of analyses representing much careful work of a kind that necessitates close and accurate scrutiny. There is no internal evidence in the paper itself that leads one to suspect that the author is blind; and, while it is certain that the manipulations described must have been performed by an assistant, this does not detract from the really remarkable accomplishment.

which is having a wholesome and beneficial influence upon the district in every way. The owner is Mr. John Brodie, one of the younger generation of factorymen who are doing so much to push honest high-class Canadian dairy products to the front. Some eight years ago the output of the Mapleton factory was only about 50 tons of cheese per year; in 1896 it had, under his management, more than trebled, reaching 150 tons; and from present indications (a make of about 20 cheese per day) this season's turnout would reach over 200 tons. Besides this, winter buttermaking was begun in a modest way by Mr. Brodie, in the winter of 1894-95 the make being about three tons; in 1895-96 it was ten tons; and in 1896-97, 16 1-2 tons, selling at an average of 18 cents per pound. We might mention that it nearly all found a market in Toronto, for which trade it was salted one ounce to the pound, that destined for the English market being salted at the rate of five-eighths ounce to the pound. One lot shipped by a dealer was neither salted nor coloured, and presumably suited the special demand for which it was intended, as no complaint was heard. Both firkins and the square 56-pound box package are used, the latter being preferred. Assuming a similar output for 1897 (it will doubtless be more), it will be seen that on a calculation well within the mark the two products, cheese and butter, of this one factory are bringing into the locality over $40,000 per year.

On the day of our visit, August 10th, a new creamery wing had been completed, and the cream from 12,000 pounds of milk taken in the previous Saturday evening was being made into over 450 pounds of butter, at a charge of 3 1-2 cents per pound to the patrons, who get the skim milk, 26 pounds of milk being required to make a pound of butter. The average for winter months last season was: December, 20.23 lbs.; January, 19.88 lbs.; February, 21.05 lbs.; March, 22.75 lbs.; April, 24.88 lbs. Proceeds are divided by fat percentage determined by the Babcock test; but this plan has not been applied in the cheesemaking. Most of the Saturday night's butter is taken out for home use by the patrons, thus doing away with the trouble of farm buttermaking, and, what is still more important, obviating entirely that long-standing grievance, Saturday night and Sunday cheesemaking, a deplorable feature of the business that ought to be removed as quickly as practicable, and which has been done in a good many cases. Where still carried on, as many of our readers are aware, it means that the Saturday night's milking brought to the factory has to be at once made up, requiring the makers, already weary with the week's hard work, to work all Saturday night and usually the greater part of Sunday afternoon; so that apart from the question of imposing upon their personal scruples, they virtually get no day of rest; nor is it to be wondered at if the Saturday night's cheese is often below the mark in quality. The explanation given is that the patrons are unable to keep the Saturday night's milk till Monday morning without great trouble and some outlay (and if they did it might be difficult to handle it all at the cheese factories), and they prefer to buy butter rather than make their own; but the patron can do a good deal if he wants to, for we heard of one who at one time wanted his Sunday morning's milk cared for in the factory, as he couldn't do it all at home, but under the new order of things he figured that he might make a little more if the Saturday night's milk were made into cheese and was able to keep it all pure and sweet till Monday morning. At the Mapleton factory we found that the milk had all been separated and everything washed up ready for the work of the following week before half-past 10 o'clock. If this is not a consummation devoutly to be wished for by all concerned we should like to know what it is.

It occurred to us that a plan and a few explanatory notes on the Mapleton factory, particularly the new creamery wing, would be of general value to dairymen, especially those about to build and improve their premises. The establishment is located about half a mile south of the village, in the valley of the Cat Fish Creek, the supply of pure, fresh cold water rising from springs in the opposite hill and flowing through pipe by gravitation into the factory. The cheese factory part to the right in plan is frame, but the new buttermaking wing is of

WHY TRICKY AS A FOX

SOME OF THE CUNNING WAYS THEY HAVE OF FOOLING THE DOGS.

How Doubling on the Trail Is Accomplished by the Cute Animals—The Chase in Relays and the Effect Thereof Upon the Pack.

"If ever there was a four-footed humorist, the fox is one," said Samuel Barton of Lancaster County, Pa., where riding to the hounds is a time-honored sport, says The New York Sun. "Particularly does he show this when, pursued by hounds, he doubles on his trail. Whenever a fox wants to rest, and at the same time enjoy the discomfiture of the dogs, he doubles, and takes his pleasure from it. When the chase is fairly under way the baying of the hounds is in concert, and, to the hunter, at least, is musical and harmonious. But the moment the trail is lost the harmony is broken; the long, melodious notes are changed to harsh barking or howling, at irregular intervals, and not until the trail is found again is the musical baying resumed. Whenever a pack of hounds is in pursuit of a fox one particular dog, either because of his superior speed or scenting powers or both, is the leader. Sometimes he is attended by a second leader. In some packs not more than two dogs run by the trail. The rest simply follow their leader, who runs a yard or two to the side of the trail to which the wind blows, and who neither carries his head up nor down, but horizontally and slightly lowered. The moment the leader loses the trail he stops and gives two or three sharp, quick bowls. If the pack is running closely together, the hounds gather around him in the greatest confusion. Noses go down almost to the ground, tails go up in the air, and each dog begins to describe a circle which gradually widens, and must eventually come in contact with the trail again. The first dog that finds the trail instantly utters the long, musical note of the chase, and the pack gathers about him. If he is not the leader, he carries the scent until the leader comes up. Then he resigns and falls in behind.

"In doubling, the fox prepares for the manœuvre by making a great spurt and getting a long distance in the lead of the pack. He knows that it is impossible for the dogs to come up with him for a certain time. He turns on his trail and follows it back the distance he has calculated on, having marked the place of divergence as he spurted. This is generally where a log or fallen tree lies at right angles from the trail. In passing that log he carried his trail several feet from it—as far as he has judged that he can leap from the trail to it when he doubles back to the spot. When he returns he clears the space between the trail and the log or tree at one jump, follows it to the other end, takes a long leap from that end and frisks away to some nearby knoll or stump, Thrilling Rescue.

A YOUNG LIFE SAVED IN A REMARKABLE MANNER.

Florence Sturdivant, Grindstone Island, Saved From an Untimely Death—Her Parents Saw Her Dangerous Predicament, But Were Helpless to Aid Her—How She Was Rescued.

Among the Thousand Islands is one called Grindstone. It is seven miles long and three wide. The inhabitants of this island are a well-informed class of people who devote their energies to farming and quarrying for a livelihood. In the home of one of these islanders resides Florence J. Sturdivant, the four-year-old daughter of Mr. and Mrs. William H. Sturdivant. In February, 1896, she was taken with scarlet fever, and after the usual run of the fever she was left with a weak back and gradually began to lose strength, until finally despite the best efforts of physicians her life hung in the balance. It was at this crisis, when all seemed darkest, that an angel of health appeared on the scene and realeased little Florence from pain and suffering and restored her to strength and health. This remarkable occurrence is best told in the words of the father.

FLORENCE J. STURDIVANT.

Mr. Sturdivant said: "Florence was taken sick with scarlet fever and we immediately called a physician. He prescribed for her and we followed his directions closely, giving our little patient the best of care. After two weeks the fever subsided, but Florence was left with a very weak back. Severe pains were constantly in the back and stomach. We did all that possibly brick veneer, plastered between the studding and then lined and ceiled inside with V. siding, painted drab. Of the building itself, the most striking feature to us was the floor, made of Portland cement, the surface being nearly as smooth and hard as a piece of marble. In the bottom next the soil about five inches of sand and gravel were pounded firmly in; and next a layer of four inches of concrete cement (five parts gravel to one of cement) was laid; then one inch (one and one-half to one), and as a finish floated with thin coat of pure cement. There is a slight "fall" to the small gutter in the center for carrying off waste water and washings. All around the edge of the floor at the walls is a couple of inches rise of cement concrete, so that the dampness will not come in contact with the woodwork. The stand or base for the separators is about a foot high, solid concrete cement. Two No. 1 Alexandra separators (capacity 5000 pounds per hour) are in use, but there is space on the stand for a third, as the diagram shows. The separator belting is driven from a similar stand opposite. There is a 400-gallon churn, power butter worker, two cream vats (capacity 200 gallons each), a receiving vat (300 gallons capacity), and suspended above it a tempering vat with five channels, outside lining galvanized iron and surrounded with chambers for regulating the temperature. The refrigerator for storing summer butter has a capacity of 2400 pounds. Roomy covered porches protect the wagons where milk for factory or creamery is being weighed in; and the whey tank, which our artist omits, stands to the right foreground, is elevated, and washed out with boiling water once a week, as it ought to be, for the vile old underground whey tank, which we still find in some places, is a breeder of villainous bacteria that would frustrate the efforts of the best cheesemakers, and has no place in a modern establishment of this description.

Mr. Brodie's price for making is $1.10 per 100 pounds of cheese, the patrons delivering the milk at the factory. This charge is the total cost to the patrons, as it covers the furnishing of all necessary material and appliances, boxing the cheese ready for shipment, cost of selling, secretary's salary, insurance on the cheese, and any printing or other incidental outlays necessary.—Farmer's Advocate.

With a Soul Above Selling Lace He Thought of Something Else.

He was a clerk in a dry goods store, and her beauty and grace simply turned his head. It was in a dry goods store, which in its way is unique, and this dry goods clerk was a creation indigenous to the plant he served. The "boopful" lady was young, albiet she is a matron, and as she stood entranced before remnants of lace and tried their different effects by spreading the mesh over her lily-white hand he, poor fellow, was entranced too.

"Isn't it beautiful?" she asked, enthusiastically, as she laid another specimen over the back of her small, plump fist.

"Exquisite! Divine!" ejaculated the bewildered clerk, with an energy that ought to have sold all the lace in the establishment, but which was lost on the object of it.

"Is it pure white or cream?" she further demanded.

"Pure white, with dimples," responded the lost knight of the yardstick.

There was one more question for the shopper to ask, and she asked it.

"Is it hand-made?"

"No," answered the poor fellow, rushing on to his doom, "it is heaven-made."

It took the manager of the department some little time to square the matter up and sell the lace, and now the too susceptible clerk is transferred to a department where he will be out of the way of temptation.

a long leap from that end and frisk away to some near-by knoll or stump, where he sits on his haunches to watch the eager pack go crying by, for the hounds, of course, dash on past the spot. If they are going at full speed the leader will run some distance beyond the point where the fox doubled on his trail before he discovers that the trail is lost and gives the signal. Then begins the confused barking and the excited, nervous circling of the hounds to cover the scent.

"It may take a quarter of an hour or twenty minutes to accomplish this, and all the time the fox sits where he can enjoy a full view of the worried dogs as they run howling and yelping in search of his trail, whisking his bushy tail, standing now and then on his hind feet to get a better view of some particularly pleasing bit of dog discomfiture, and showing his exceeding enjoyment of the whole proceeding, for which his cunning is responsible, by various pirouettings and comical cap rings. But the moment a dog strikes the trail and announces the fact to his fellows, the fox pricks up his ears, gives his brush an extra flourish, and bolts in the opposite direction, to repeat at his leisure the same trick elsewhere, if all goes well.

"Another way the fox foils the best of hounds and gets fun out of them is to lead them in the chase by relays. This foxes habitually do if they are chased while raising their young. At such times the male fox, suspecting trouble of this kind, lies several feet away from his kennel, which may be a hole in the rocks, a hollow log, or the space beneath the roots of a fallen tree, and where his mate and her litter are lying snug. When the hounds, in their beating about, start him from his cover, away he goes, leading them a lively chase. A well-bred fox hound will run from six to ten hours at a pace of between seven and ten miles an hour, when at a considerable distance behind a fox. At a distance of a hundred yards or so, although he may not see the fox, he knows of its proximity by the warmth of its trail, and he will run, in his eagerness to overtake the quarry, at the rate of fifteen or twenty miles an hour. Such a pace is killing, and can be maintained only a short time.

"The wily fox knows this well, and when he starts on a race in which his mate is to aid him, he keeps but a short distance ahead of the dogs, but sets the killing pace. He keeps this up for perhaps eight miles, gradually circling back to the starting point. Here the female, all fresh, is ready to carry the trail at the same pace, while her mate diverges from it at a right angle to rest and refresh himself to go on with the race when she has led back to the post. The hounds keep right on after the female, in want of the trick the sagacious beasts are playing. She, in turn, is relieved by the male fox, who starts in as good as new; and this is kept up without cessation, so that in two or three hours, if not less, the dogs are exhausted, and must give up the run. When thus worn out, with the trail still warm under their noses, the hounds abandon the chase with distressful yelpings, as if feeling that they must be victims of unfair dealing of some kind. This unmistakable signal of defeat is what the foxes have been working and waiting for, and the one that is in hearing immediately answers it with sharp, aggravating, mocking cries. This is the finishing blow, and the dogs sneak home in humiliation and silence. Some of them will get over the disgrace by next day, some not for weeks, while others can never be induced to follow a fox's trail again, and these always the very best dogs in the pack."

Origin of "Tip."

Here is an interesting bit of philology. It concerns the origin of the word "tip," and throws a little light on the origin of the custom. In old English taverns a receptacle for small coin was placed conspicuously, and over it was written, "To Insure Promptness." Whatever was dropped in the box by guests was divided among the servants. In the course of time the abbreviated form, "T. I. P." was used.

Away Down East. From east to west people have heart trouble. This causes violent headaches, neuralgia, nerve trouble and prostration. Says Mrs. Somers, of Moncton, N.B.: "I tried many remedies but never found anything to give me such prompt relief as Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills have done. I suffered from the above symptoms, but now gladly testify to the cure these wonderful pills have made in my case, and I hope all sufferers will stomach. We did all that possibly could be done to relieve our little sufferer, but to no avail. The difficulty seemed to baffle the efforts of the physician.

"Finally at the end of four months of treatment, we found our patient completely prostrated. At this time we called another physician, who agreed with the disagnosis of our own doctor, and said that the trouble resulted from the scarlet fever. He prescribed a course of treatment and we followed it faithfully for three months, but instead of improving, Florence failed.

"Mrs. Sturdivant and myself were completely discouraged. A brother of my wife, who was visiting us, advised us to use Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People, and I purchased a box of the pills and began to give them to Florence. This was in October, 1896. After using the pills a short time we could see an improvement. Her strength began to return and she would sit up in bed. Her appetite was restored and she ate heartily. We also noticed a gradual brightness in her eyes.

"We eagerly purchased a further supply of pills and watched with delight the change for the better that was being wrought daily. From sitting up in bed at times during the day and at times standing on her feet, Florence finally became strong enough to walk a little. She gained in flesh and strength rapidly and the pains gradually left her. In a month's time she had recovered her health and strength.

"We cannot praise too highly the value of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. I am positive that without their use our child would have been to-day in the same sad condition of her early sickness—a confirmed invalid—if indeed she had the strength to withstand so long the ills of her affliction."

Bees Must Have Water.

It is very necessary that water be supplied to bees during the working season. The bees in the field do not need to use the water for themselves, but they need it to mix with pollen to feed the brood. Bees that are not feeding brood do not need water, but when there is brood in the hive, water and a little salt should be given them. Put a handful of salt in a pail of water and pour it into a tight grocery box, then cover the box. The water will slowly ooze out at the joints of the box and the bees can sip it up without drowning.—Journal of Agriculture.

When to Use Phosphates.

The tendency of phosphate to revert to insoluble forms when brought in contact with dry earth makes it necessary to use it only in places and at times when plenty of rain will supply the moisture to keep its plant food in condition for use. Hence phosphate is much more effective used on fall-grown grain or on the crops planted very early in the spring. If a long spell of dry weather follows its application the phosphate will revert so that water alone will not again dissolve it. But in soils which contain any organic matter the water they contain must have an excess of carbonic acid gas, which is derived from the decay of plants. It is this carbonic acid gas in spring waters that makes them bubble up as they come out of the earth and adds greatly to their palatableness. In their passage through the soil these waters have come in contact with much carbonic acid gas, and have necessarily absorbed a part of it. But on limestone soils this spring water has already absorbed as much lime as it can hold. Consequently it is less valuable to make phosphate of lime soluble than is ordinary rain water which has absorbed its carbonic acid gas directly from the atmosphere only.

The best effects of superphosphate of lime are to be found on land that is low, moist and full of vegetable mould. This usually has but little lime, and what carbonic acid gas its water contains is free from that mineral. This is very important. The value of superphosphate consists very largely in its excess of phosphate over the lime it contains. So soon as more lime is added, this excess combines with sulphuric acid, which must subsist in all superphosphate. This makes it merely sulphate of lime. Hence the practice of some farmers in extending their high-priced superphosphate by adding to it of gypsum or land plaster is a great mistake. At its best, the superphosphate contains all and more of this gypsum than the soil requires. To add more only puts the whole of the phosphate into a condition where it can only be dissolved when brought into contact with carbonic acid gas, or some other equally powerful solvent.

Both potash and salt are excellent for topdressing land on which phosphate has been drilled with the grain crop. It is not best to try to mix these and drill them together. The superphosphate in moist soil will help the plant best alone. Besides, both salt and potash draw moisture from the air so rapidly that when mixed with phosphate they make it too wet and sticky to drill evenly. But applied in spring or fall, phosphated winter grain, either salt or ashes, will produce a very remarkable effect in encouraging both the grain crop and the grass and clover seeding to utilize the phosphate applied the fall before. Salt especially should always be used on phosphated land in the spring. It will be all washed away by winter and spring rains if it is applied in the fall.

POULTRY IN ORCHARD.

Fowls Do Good Service in Two Very Distinct Ways.

Mr. Tegetmeier, the famous English authority on poultry, in commenting on a report of the Rhode Island Experiment Station regarding the value of fowls to orchards, says: For many years I have advocated the introduction of poultry into apple orchards, maintaining that they do good service, in two very distinct modes—first, by manuring the ground, and, secondly, by the distruction of insects and grubs that hibernate in the soil.

The apple maggot appears to be extending in America, attacking the favorite Baldwin, which is so well-known as being imported largely into this country, and rendering it entirely unfit for use, but the spraying the trees with Bordeaux mixture and paris green has appeared to prevent all serious attacks of this insect.

In the mature state this insect is a fly, which deposits its eggs in the pulp of the apple beneath the skin. The young maggots grow within the fruit, which they render worthless, and when mature emerge from the apple and go into the ground, lying in the pupa state beneath the surface soil among the grass roots. Samples of the earth, six inches square, were taken, and the numbers of maggots under the trees varied, according to the size, from 1600 to more than 12,000 under each tree, the pupae somewhat resembling kernels of wheat. Now comes the point which was particularly interesting to me. The experiment was tried as to whether poultry, if confined to a small range and encouraged to scratch, would destroy these pupae. A large movable wire fence was placed about a tree, whose fruit had been destroyed by insects. One side of the fence was raised and 50 hens were called into the inclosure. The fence was let down and they were confined to the space around the tree. As soon as they had eaten the corn they naturally began to scratch for pupae, and in the course of three or four days it was found that the latter had disappeared. As these insects remain in the pupae state from the fall of the apple to the following spring, when they appear, it may be expected that next year the number of flies breeding from the apple maggot will be greatly diminished in the localities where this plan is followed.

From personal experience, extending over many years, I can speak positively of the advantages of allowing fowls and chickens a free range in apple orchards. They not only manure the soil and destroy all insects harboring in it, but they find, for some weeks, a considerable portion of their own food—the windfalls, which they devour greedily, with any grubs they may contain.

Rural Telephones.

Twelve months ago there were comparatively few farm telephone lines in the country, but as the telephone itself has been cheapening, the farmers have become alive to its value, says an exchange.

The State of Illinois has been especially active in the establishment of these rural lines. The system is cheaply and substantially constructed, each farmer contributing poles and work in hauling and setting poles, and an experienced man has charge of the placing of the instruments, which range in price from $10 to $16.

One system in the State embraces nearly 100 instruments, with two central stations. The farmers are delighted with the result of their own enterprise, as they say they can order anything from a spool of thread to a harvest hand without moving outside their door.

Merchants of the different towns connected with the system hire delivery wagons to deliver such goods as have been ordered at regular periods, the mail being taken around at the same time. In one district the farmers find their 18-mile long telephone line of untold convenience. They are enabled to order boats for transportation and supplies with a few words spoken over the wire, whereas formerly they were compelled to send a messenger across country.

The poor and suffering love her well—
Such ready sympathy she shows;
The sorrow-burdened freely tell
To her woes.

For those who stumble, those who fall,
Her heart with gentlest ruth is stirred;
She has a kindly smile for all—
A cheering word.

With fate she never wages strife;
"It must be right, since God knows best";
And so she lives her usual life,
Blessing and blest.

She strews the thorny path with flowers;
She turns the darkness into day;
And as we clasp her hands in ours,
We can but say:

"Dear friend, so rich in love and truth,
With large, warm heart, and steadfast mind,
'Twas well for some that in your youth
The men were blind."

DEED OF KINDNESS.

We had come upon an Indian village along the banks of a creek close under the steep sides of a mountain, and we charged at once and soon had possession. Most of the warriors were away on an expedition, but a sub-chief named Gray Wolf, who was lame from a wound, was in command. Our revolvers and sabers made quick work of those who opposed us, and, in seeking to get away, Gray Wolf was knocked down by a horse and rendered unconscious. He was one of the 28 prisoners we safely conveyed back to the fort, and as he was known to be one of the most bloodthirsty of his tribe his confinement was a rigorous one. He was placed in a cell in the guardhouse by himself, loaded down with irons, and all members of the guard on duty were permitted to stare at and outrageously abuse him by word of mouth. Gray Wolf was a young man of dignity and pride, and he perhaps felt the insults more than the confinement, though he made no complaint in

I had seen him in the guardhouse he was ragged, unkempt and suffering. Here he was king of a tribe, and he looked it in word and action. I saw his eyes light up in a revengeful way as I stood before him, and it was two long minutes before he said:

"They should have captured all your men as well. We can burn six or eight at the stake as well as one."

I had been wondering what sort of attitude to assume towards him. That he should remember to my credit what he passed in the guardhouse I did not for a moment believe. To beg my life would only be to win his contempt and sign out his torture. In an even voice, therefore, I replied:

"Gray Wolf was only a sub-chief when I saw him last. He is now chief of all, and I am glad to know it. Black Eagle was a chief, but not a brave man. He tortured soldiers at the stake instead of shooting them."

"I was a dog under their feet at the fort," he said as his face grew hard and wicked.

"And yet you escaped."

Here was an Indian who had been born to hate a pale-face. Every day of his life he had been told they were his foes—that he must have no feeling of mercy for old or young—that he could invent no torture too cruel for those who had overrun his territory and is too noble a goddess to receive the sacrifice of our virtues, and, degraded thus, she will become a Nemesis to her votaries.

There has never been a time when the nations of the world have presented so formidable an array of armies and navies. This, so far from indicating any warlike disposition on their part, is really the result of costly and strenuous efforts to maintain peace. The forced mistress is easily broken. It is not necessary to even the most destructive wars that there should be the old passion of fanatic heroism or any sublime purpose making the sacrifice worthy. It is far more likely that Germany may be embroiled in war with England for some petty cause than that both will unite to throttle the monster who so very existence is at once a menace and a disgrace to Christian Europe. While we Americans are congratulating ourselves upon a situation of isolation and immunity as compared with that of any European power, and though actually we like spirit appears to be for us almost impossible whatever efforts we may make to arouse it—yet any day some reckless Congressional manifesto or some foolish traditional prejudice may precipitate war between us and Spain, or Japan, or England, and our inadequate preparedness for war is a constant temptation to such provocation on the part of those powers as may seem to justify the manifesto or to reinforce the prejudice.

Our assurance of peace must lie, first of all, indeed, in our desire for peace, but, next to this, in our adequate armament, and our resolve to maintain a wise but firm and courageous National policy in our external relations, remembering always what is due from us to a militant Christendom. Harper's Weekly.

felt the insults more than the confinement, though he made no complaint in either case. He had been confined for three weeks when, as sergeant of the guard, I looked in on him one day and began a conversation in his own tongue. It resulted in his showing me that the irons were galling him, and of his asking protection from further insult. I reported to the officer of the day and the irons were removed, and I got some salve from the hospital steward to soothe the broken flesh. I gave Gray Wolf news of his fellow prisoners and of his tribe outside, and at the risk of censure spliced out his prison fare with a part of my rations. I did these things for him as I would have done them for a wild animal, and not because I sympathized with him as a human being. An Indian may be technically called a human being, but it is nearer the truth to refer to him as a human devil. In getting the redskin released from his irons I did him the turn he was hoping for. That night, with a wideawake sentinel standing only six feet away, Gray Wolf tunneled under the basement logs of his prison and made good his escape, and it was only by a close shave that I escaped a court-martial. The fellow showed the devil in his nature even as he fled. Coming across a teamster lying under his wagon in a drunken stupor Gray Wolf paused to murder and scalp him, and from that hour on a price was set upon his head and every soldier in the west was determined to shoot him down, even if he offered to surrender.

Two months after the escape of Gray Wolf, and while his tribe was still waging a relentless warfare, I was ordered out of Fort Gray with a squad of troopers to bridge a creek about five miles away. No Indians had been seen within ten miles of the fort, and we knew for a fact that the main body of them were raiding 50 miles to the west. Seven troopers fully armed and exercising due vigilance were thought abundantly able to take care of themselves, and two hours after leaving the fort we were hard at work. We needed a straight tree-trunk 28 feet long for one of the string-pines at the bridge. Leaving my horse at his picket-pin I started out alone in search of the right sort of tree. We were on a forest-covered foothill, with masses of rock outcropping here and there. I was about 40 rods from the men and just passing one of these outcrops when I was struck down. I saw the arm of an Indian and a club, and then there was a crash and a legion of fiery stars. It was perhaps five minutes before I opened my eyes and found myself lying on the ground. The Indians, of whom there were three, must have heard of me through Gray Wolf, for I was one of the two men at the post who could speak the Sioux dialect, and one of them said to me:

"If you cry out we will kill you! Get up and come along!"

I staggered about as I reached my feet, and one of them took my arm to help me along. With one leading the way and the other bringing up the rear we set off in a western direction, and were soon out of hearing of the axes of my comrades. For a time my head throbbed and ached so that I thought my skull had been fractured, and we had gone a distance of two miles before I fully realized that I was a captive. The one holding my arm was the one who had struck me with a club, and by and by I asked of him:

"Why didn't you use your tomahawk instead of a club?"

"Didn't want to kill you," he laconically replied. "Have heap more fun to burn you at stake."

"Who is your chief?"

"Gray Wolf chief of all now. He know you. Go fast now and don't talk."

The Indians had their war paint on and were well armed, and had perhaps been skulking about for two or three days in hopes to get hold of a straggler. After a rough walk of four miles we came upon their ponies and a rough camp, and no time was lost in mounting and getting away. I was ordered up behind one of the warriors, and they left my hands and feet entirely free. While this was a favor to me, it did not add to my chances of escape. In fact, with an Indian ahead and another behind, there was no show whatever. At the first move on my part, as I was warned over and over again, I would get a bullet through me. We rode about 30 miles in a northwesterly direction and then reached the head village on the banks of White Clay creek. A war party of 140 men under Gray Wolf was out, but the warriors, old men, squaws and boys at home numbered fully 500. As we rode into camp there was great excitement, and I looked for personal abuse, but I was safely conducted through the crowd and confined in a lodge in the center of the village. It was three days before the band came in, and during this interval I had nothing to complain of in the way of food or treatment. After Gray Wolf had feasted and smoked I was conducted to his lodge and left alone with him. As I could invent no torture too cruel for those who had overrun his territory and brought death and wounds to his friends and relatives. At that moment he was waging a war of extermination, and outside his tent the young warriors were shaking fresh scalps in the air and boasting of their prowess. On the other hand, I had aided him to escape from a degrading imprisonment and to become what he was. He owed me a debt of hatred and one of gratitude. As a warrior he would have paid the first with rejoicing. As a chief he felt the obligation of the last. The mental struggle lasted fully ten minutes, and there were times when the weight of a hair would have turned the scales against me. At length he said:

"Yes, I escaped, and it was owing to you. I heard that they wanted to imprison you in my place. Gray Wolf has never yet spared a pale-face, and his heart is full of hate and revenge. I do not know what I shall do. I will take the night to think it over."

As soon as I was taken back to the lodge where I had been confined there was great excitement in camp. The word went round that Gray Wolf wanted to spare me. Every warrior raised his voice in opposition, and the "talk" which was entered upon lasted till midnight. I figured it out that the chief would give me some sort of show in the morning and then fell into a troubled sleep and did not awaken until he sent for me at sunrise. A glance at him seemed to show that he was in better temper.

"I wanted to send you back to the fort," he began, "but my young men talked me down. You shall not die of torture, however. You are to be bound to a wild, fast pony, given a good start, and if come up with they will kill you."

I thanked him for his "mercy" and was hustled out to find five or six warriors holding an unbroken pony by ropes. It may have been an animal lately captured from a wild herd, but I am sure no one had ever been on his back. It took two warriors ten minutes to seat me and tie my legs under his belly, and he was then led straight out on the bush-covered plain, yelled at until almost frightened to death, then suddenly set loose. As he bounded away I heard the yells of mounted warriors behind, with cheers from the squaws and boys, and the race had begun. I was an old rider and had seen some pretty hard mounts in my day, but that pony capped the climax. Even while running at top speed he tried every trick to shake me loose, and but for being tied I could not have kept my place five minutes. What I feared was that he would make a circle and return, but he had been so frightened that he was glad to cut loose from camp, and nothing on legs could have overhauled him. The Indians hung to us for a couple of miles, probably hoping to see the animal tire or stop, but after that I heard no more of them. The first ten miles was down a long and narrow valley; the next five was across broken ground leading to the foothills. It was only after we got among the rough hills that the pony slackened up, and by reaching forward and cuffing his head with my hand I guided him fairly well. A little more than two hours after being turned loose I struck the trail leading to the fort, and it is a matter of military record that the orderly sergeant of company C rode into that post on a wild cayuse of a certain August morning, and that it took most of the men of his company to hold the animal and cast the fugitive prisoner loose. Grey Wolf yet lives. Two years after my escape I met him at a reservation, and as we shook hands he said:

"How—how! My young men complained that I gave you too good a pony!"

Vestadium.

Vestadium, a new aluminum alloy, is said to be possessed of considerable strength. Its inventors claim that it is of far greater utility than any metal of the same specific gravity at present known. Vestadium is an alloy of aluminum, with a specific gravity of 2.73—that is, about one-third the weight of steel of the same volume, and is therefore of the same specific gravity as pure aluminum, which is the lightest metal in mercantile use. In some tests made in England, a tube of the metal, 12 inches long, was fixed with one end against a support, and pressure applied to the other end. The tube commenced to yield only when a pressure of over 4800 pounds had been applied, and was only very slightly crushed at a pressure of more than 5000 pounds. One of the great advantages of vestadium tubes is that they never snap. In the whole of 12 tests made the metal was found to be homegeneous, and in every case the fracture was clean and silky. Vestadium is non-corrosive; the atmosphere and water take no effect upon it, and sulphuric acid leaves no mark on it. In color it is said to be whiter than silver. It takes a fine polish, which does not tarnish, and requires very little cleaning.

VARYING LAKE LEVELS.

Inquiries as to the Causes of the So-Called Tidal Waves.

The peculiar phenomena on the lakes which are popularly, but erroneously, styled "tidal waves," have attracted attention and caused speculation among scientists and laymen. At the recent British Association meeting, Mr. F. Napier Denison of the Toronto University read a paper on "The Great Lakes as a Sensitive Barometer," in which an attempt was made to explain the causes of these oscillations of lake surface. Mr. Denison's observations were taken in the shallower part of Lake Ontario, fronting Toronto, under conditions strongly resembling those at the Lake Erie ports where the "tidal waves" have been most noticed. The records show that the longitudinal and transverse "seiche" movements are very marked preceding and during storms primarily due to differences of atmospheric pressure over the extremeties of the lake, but greatly augmented when the gale strikes the water surface. The mean time interval of longitudinal "seiche" is four hours and forty-nine minutes; the transverse, forty-five minutes. There is a marked agreement between the time intervals of the smaller lake undulations and those found upon the corresponding sensitive barograph traces, both showing a predominance of twenty-minute intervals.

Mr. Denison explains the smaller lake undulations as due to atmospheric waves, which are set up along the boundary surfaces of different air strata when traveling in opposite directions. The action of these atmospheric waves upon the surface of the water tends to form minute undulations, which increase in amplitude as they move into bays, where the water becomes shallower, until finally they assume the proportions as recorded upon the instrument.

It was found that marked rapid and large undulations often occur during the autumn and winter months upon both instruments, when the barometer is actually rising and fine weather prevails over all the surrounding territory. The explanation is that at such times an area of slow pressure, a cyclone, is situated over the South or Southwestern States, which usually moves over or near to the lake region. In such cases the recorded atmospheric waves are due to the lower, denser air of the anti-cyclone moving towards the southwestern cyclone, along whose upper boundary surface huge waves, extending to the earth, are set up by the rapidly opposing upper poleward current. The mean velocity of this upper current in summer is sixty miles per hour, and in winter 110 miles per hour. On the other hand, during the approach of an anti-cyclone, attended by fine weather and westerly winds,

ELUSIVE PRESENCE.

And didst thou come, thou long-lost, longed-for one,
That day, when, thinking not of thee, I cried
For rescue from my foes on every side—
Didst point the refuge whither I could run?
And didst thou come, that evening drear and dun,
When thinking not of thee—too sorely tried,
I looked and saw the western clouds divide,
And the fair setting of the full-orbed sun?
And didst thou come on that dark, sighing dawn,
Shadowed with troubles of the day to be,
When, suddenly, obeying thy still call,
Were all those surging fears dismissed and gone?
And didst thou come all hours and blessing all,
Except the hour when most I think of thee?
—Edith M. Thomas, in The Century.

JUST IN TIME.

We had been telling stories, as we sat in the moonlight on the porch of the old homestead. It was but a summer resort then, left to the care of servants in the winter; but well filled with old friends in the hot, dry months. Stories of adventure, of personal disasters, of land, of sea, had filled the evening; but it was still too early to retire, when Elsie, putting her pretty golden head down on my shoulder, said:

"Tell the story, father, of the day you were just in time."

The only romance of my hum-drum life! I was willing enough, and this is the story: Ten years before, while I was still in business as a carriage-builder in the small town of Bolton I had in my employ a young man named Hartley, who was more to me, having no son of my own than merely one of the "hands."

He was the son of John Hartley, who was one of the meanest, close-fisted men in the world, and thoroughly disliked by the entire population of Bolton. A dealer in real estate, he was known as one who insisted on the payment of his rents, even if it took the food from the mouths of his tenants, or the beds from under the sick, to pay him.

When young George Hartley first came to me to seek employment he was a handsome lad of 16, with a bright, frank face, shadowed at that time by the recent death of his mother. It was understood that the wages, George being a minor, were to be paid to John Hartley, and he was punctually at the door on pay day.

Knowing that the lad had been a good scholar, his mother's influence having kept him at Bolton school during her life, I lent him books and invited him often to my house, where Elsie would leave my father alone," he answered. "I have kept my word. He is not alone; he has his wife. Two years ago, if you remember, you offered me a letter to your brother in New York, who, you said, would give me a position in his counting house."

"I remember."

"Will you give me that letter now, sir? I can leave here on the ten o'clock train and be in New York to-morrow. Even if your brother has no place for me I can live on what money I have for a time, and your letter will help me to some work. In a year I shall be free!"

"Was I wrong to uphold him? I did so with my whole heart. I wrote to my brother, gave George the letter, and then, fastening up the house, we started together to walk to the railway station. We were half way there when we met John Hartley and his wife returning from church. Supposing that George was going to see me off, they stopped for a few minutes, spoke a few words of farewell, hoped I would come back in better health and went their way. Five minutes later George and I were in our seats in the car. The schooner in which I was going to sail was a coaster, going to the Gulf of Mexico, and was to sail at five o'clock in the morning. Having time at his own disposal, George decided to go with me to Keyport and see me off, promising to write to Elsie as soon as I was fairly afloat.

It had long been evident to me that Elsie loved my young friend, and during that night ride he spoke to me frankly of his love for her, and won my free consent to ask her to be his wife as soon as he had established himself in some settled business. It had been a life-long attachment, and I knew the sterling worth of the man who loved my little girl.

We parted at five o'clock in the morning of the 23rd of April, and George Hartley had not been out of my sight since nine o'clock of the evening of the 22nd. I went to the Gulf of Mexico, and, finding the air was helping me, moved from place to place along the coast, keeping ever on or near the water until the 1st of June. I wrote to Elsie, but heard nothing from her, as I was moving about constantly, and we had arranged that I was not to expect letters. On the 3rd of June I was again in Bolton and speeding homeward bound, knowing Elsie was expecting me. I had avoided the main street, anxious to be at home, but in a smaller street, not far from the court house, I met an old friend.

To my amazement he sprang to meet me, crying:

"Surely Providence has sent you here to-day! Come, we have not a moment to lose!"

"Come where? What is it? Elsie?" I cried.

"No, no! There is nothing wrong with Elsie, but they are trying George Hartley for murder, and he says you can save him."

"For murder!" I cried.

"The murder of his father on the 22nd of April. The evidence is overwhelming. Mrs. Hartley swears that her husband was robbed of $600 on the night when he was murdered, and she has the numbers of the notes. They were found on George when he was arrested in New York."

We were hurrying toward the court-house, but my friend spoke rapidly.

"Mrs. Hartley swears that there was some noise in the lower part of the house that aroused her and she went down. When she returned the window had been forced open, the money stolen and her husband lay on the floor dead, with a horrible wound on the back of his head. George ran away that night on the midnight train to New York."

We were at the courthouse by this time, and pressed our way through the crowd, who were listening to the evidence that threatened to hang George Hartley for murder. I made my way to the seat where the lawyer who was defending him was gravely listening to the witness on the stand. The prisoner was looking down as I bent over and whispering to his lawyer, but suddenly looking up he saw me. One great shout broke from his pale lips:

"Heaven has sent you! I am saved!" and fell senseless on the floor. Had he studied the effect for months he could not have made it more convincing. Not a man in the crowded court room doubted his innocence then.

My evidence was taken, and being a man well-known in Bolton, it was sufficient to prove George Hartley guiltless. As I told the true story of the money, I could see that the sympathy of all was with the prisoner. All Bolton knew how hard a parent his father had been.

The jury were out but a few moments, to return with the verdict: "Not guilty!" and George and I left the court room arm in arm, followed by the cheering of the crowd. We found Elsie white and trembling in the parlor waiting for us.

"You are not angry because I came back?" she pleaded, clinging to me. "I for dodging and ignoring a great and vital fact simply because a few prejudiced, misguided people have antiquated ideas of what constitutes morality and modesty? Reason and honesty say —certainly not. Men and women are attracted to each other because they are men and women and because it is right and necessary that they should be so attracted. The things that make a man attractive are the characteristics caused by his inherent manliness—by the strength which makes him a perfect man. The same is true of woman. There is strong attractiveness in perfect health. There is fascination and magnetism in it. A woman cannot be entirely womanly—she cannot be a perfect woman—if she is not in perfect health. In just so much as her sickness affects the organs that make her a woman, in just so much she loses attractiveness. This is the vital part of her health. If anything is wrong there, it may result in all manner of ills all over the body. Careless, or too busy, physicians frequently treat the symptoms of this kind of disorder as separate and distinct ailments. The symptoms are many and varied, so much so that when a woman is sick in any way, the first thought should be given to the organs distinctly feminine. About 9 times in 10 the cause of the trouble will be found there. Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription cures all disorders of this kind. There is no guesswork about it. There is no chance about it. It is a fact that has been demonstrated in 30 solid years of extensive practice.

Thousands of women have written grateful letters, who have wished the whole world of women to know the wonderful things the "Prescription" has done for them.

MAKING HUSBANDS HAPPY.

How to Fulfill the Sacred Duty of Every Married Woman.

Recipes for making husbands happy are almost as multitudinous as dyspepsia cures; but one of the most notable additions to the list, which possesses at least the charm of novelty, was that prescribed at a recent meeting of the Professional Women's League, in New York, by Mrs. Emma Sheridan Fry, who in a brightly humorous paper on the frivolities of her sex threw out this specific:

I asked a friend of mine, who is the happiest woman I know—that is to say, whose husband is the happiest man I know—how she managed it, and she said: "Good looks! good dressing! and flirting!" And when I inquired about the flirting, she explained: "A woman may or may not flirt with her husband before she marries him. That is as she chooses. But to flirt with her husband after she marries him is the second duty of every woman!"

Before marriage every woman has her own ideas as to the best way by which a husband may be made happy. After marriage a change is too apt to come o'er the spirit of her dreams. In too many cases she feels privileged to look frowsy and to dress slouchily; and as to flirting with her better half—except to flirt the price of an Easter bonnet out of his pocket—she is more apt to consider flirtation with him as incompatible with her ideas of true wifely duty than to set about it with that light touch of spontaneity which alone can give it savor. Mrs. Fry is a humorist; but her humor on this question veils a sound philosophy. Her triple extract of conjugal happiness might fail to prove invariably successful; but it can, at least, be recommended as harmless. Indeed, if she had only omitted the ingredient of flirting, which needs to be administered with caution, she might have been credited with a formula for happiness worthy to be recommended to all of her sex, single as well as married.

per hour. On the other hand, during the approach of an anti-cyclone, attended by fine weather and westerly winds, these lake undulations become extremely small because the lower air moves in approximately the same direction as the upper poleward current. In illustration of the direct action of these air waves upon the surface of the lake Mr. Denison notes that on March 8 last, during the passage of several successive huge atmospheric "billows," the water rose 8 1-2 inches in ten minutes, then fell 10 1-2 inches in fifteen minutes, followed by the phenomenal rise of 11 1-2 inches in fifteen minutes.

The information obtained from fishermen on Lakes Ontario, Erie and Huron shows that a twenty-minute interval has been frequently observed between the two or more so-called "tidal waves" that follow each other.

The Evolution of Agriculture.

Agriculture, in the opinion of many, is considered to be a form of industry more laborious and less attractive to natural man than hunting or herding, and that it is consequently only undertaken under constraint, this being generally due to pressure of population on available means of subsistence. We cannot accept this conclusion in its entirety, as place must always condition work. Let us presume that primitive man was first of all a hunter and nothing else. He would first have to adopt himself to climatic conditions, for anything that alters these conditions alters vegetation at once. If there was an abundance of rain, with suitable conditions of soil, there would be in the vegetable struggle for existence a victory for trees over grass, and the hunter's place would then be the forest. But if in the vegetable struggle grass survived, he would be placed on the plain or steppe, and this naturally becomes the feeding ground of herbivorous animals.

Whether in the forest or on the steppe, natural man lived in the early stage of his existence by hunting both carnivorous and herbivorous animals, especially the latter. We are thus unable to accept the views held that primitive man, when placed in forests, gave himself up to the hunting of animals, but when placed in grass regions devoted himself to their domestication. Primitive natural man, wherever found, was a hunter of animals, and at the same time a gatherer of fruits, seeds, nuts and roots. The hunter also first began to domesticate animals. By various arts and devices he would entrap his game, and in preserving his spoil for future use he would first create the art or science of domestication. For example, we know that wild horses were first hunted for food alone, and when large numbers were entrapped they were safely kept as a source of food supply. Following on contact with the animals came the recognition of mare's milk as another source of food supply, and last of all came their utilization as an aid to the hunter in seeking for and chasing his game. Even in our own era elephants that have been tamed are employed to entice, chase and catch other elephants roaming wild in their natural habitat.—Westminster Review.

SCOTT & BOWNE, Belleville, Ont.

kept him at Bolton school during her life, I lent him books and invited him often to my house, where Elsie would play and sing for him, or read with him. He studied in every leisure moment, but was a good workman, never shirking the manual labor that was really too much drudgery for a boy of his ability. With my knowledge he went through a course of bookkeeping under my own head clerk, and here begins my story.

I had had in my employ a young man as assistant bookkeeper who had left me for what he thought a better position, and I entered into an engagement with George Hartley, who was to do his work, after hours, receiving from me five dollars a week in addition to his regular wages, which sum I paid to him unknown to his father. If it was defrauding that worthy man of his right to his son's brains and industry, why, I so defrauded him.

By my advice the money was deposited in the Bolton bank, and for nearly four years it accumulated there, until there was more than $600, some of the money having been spent in keeping the lad decently clothed.

He was twenty years old when John Hartley married his second wife, an old maid, who was one of his tenants, and who had property of her own. From the day when she entered the house Mrs. Hartley commenced a series of petty persecutions of her stepson, pinthrusts to make his life miserable, but seemingly too trifling for a man to notice. She hated him because he had tried to prevent the marriage, solely for love of his dead mother.

It was in April, when my physicians ordered me to take a sea trip for a chronic complaint that was troubling me, and I made my preparations to go in a schooner from Keyport, the nearest seaport town to Bolton, and some 30 miles east of it. There was a train from Boston that passed through Bolton at ten o'clock in the evening and connected with the stage at Keyport. It was a New York train, but not express, stopping at many of the way stations; but it was the only one by which connection could be made with Keyport, the New York express passing Bolton at midnight.

I had sent my baggage to the station, had made all my arrangements, and was sitting in my study waiting for the hour to leave, when the door-bell rang. Elsie was in Bolton, visiting an aunt until my return, and the servants had all gone away, as the house was to be closed, so I opened the door myself. It was George Hartley who was on my steps, a small satchel in his hand, and his face white with excitement.

I had still an hour of time at my disposal and I drew him into the house, certain before he spoke that there had come a crisis in his hard life. I will not try to tell the story in his own words, broken as they were by anger and excitement, but this was the substance of it:

He had been out at tea time, avoiding the family meals as often as he could, and on coming home had gone directly to his own room, which was over the one occupied by his father. The day had been warm, oppressively so for April, and all the windows were open. Seated by the one in his own room, George Hartley could hear distinctly what was said in the room beneath. He was reading, scarcely heeding the voices at first, but presently roused to keen listening and burning indignation. His stepmother had been prying in his room and had found his bank book, where he had supposed it was securely concealed. John Hartley's rage at the discovery was great, and he had gone to the bank and drawn out the entire sum, just as the bank was closing, and too late to pass it in to his own account.

He was going with his wife to a church meeting, being an active church member, and they were discussing the best place to put the money during their absence. After some bickering on the subject they decided to roll the notes in a piece of newspaper and thrust them behind the frame of a mirror over the mantelpiece. No one would look there, or if anyone did there was only a piece of newspaper to be seen. As an additional precaution John Hartley took the numbers of the notes.

Keeping down his inclination to dash into the room and claim his own, George waited as patiently as he could until the couple had left the house, when he went to the room to find the door locked and bolted. He was reckless by that time and went to the porch, climbed to its roof under his father's window and smashed the blinds outside, unbolted them, raised the window, and sprang into the room. The money was secured, the newspaper replaced and he left the room again by the way he had entered it. Packing a satchel, he left the house and came to me.

"I will never return," he said to me, "and if it is theft to take what I have honestly earned, I am a thief, for I have it."

"I have wondered you staid so long," I said.

"You are not angry because I came back?" she pleaded, clinging to me. "I heard the news in Boston and auntie came home with me. I knew George was innocent, even before I saw him, and it comforted him to see me," she said, turning to her lover.

I did not doubt that as I saw them clinging together, their faces still pale with recent sorrow, but a glad light shining in their eyes.

The mystery of John Hartley's death has never been solved. His son thinks he was not murdered, but fell and struck his head. His stepmother's hatred of him and the fact that his death would make her the heiress of her husband's wealth were sufficient motives for her accusation.

By his father's will, George Hartley inherited the whole of his father's estate, with a life income to Mrs. John Hartley that is punctually paid. He was a far wealthier man than was supposed and George Hartley is to-day one of the richest men in Bolton and the happiest of husbands and fathers. Eh, Elsie?

"He is here to answer for himself," she answered, as we saw a tall figure come up the garden path, the figure of the man whose innocence I had proved.—New York Ledger.

Doves and Religion.

"One thing I remarked and think worthy of notice is that ever since Noah's dove every religion seems to consider the pigeon as a sacred bird; for example, every mosque swarms with pigeons * * * and the same exists in most Italian market places; the Hindoo pundits and the old Assyrian Empire also have them; while Catholics make it the emblem of the Holy Ghost."

Lady Burton, in her account of the Mohammedan mystery play of "Hassan and Hossein," which occurs in the below quoted works, says:

"Then comes the bier with Hossein's corpse, and his son sitting upon it sorrowing and embracing him, and a beautiful white dove in the corner, whose wings are dabbled with blood. The effect upon the excited crowd is awful."—From the Life of Sir Richard Burton.

Valued the Home Journey Most.

An English peer, for some offence, was called out by a politician, and promptly responded to the challenge. On arriving at home again after the duel his lordship gave a guinea to the coachman who had driven to and from the ground. The driver appears to have been an exceptionally honest, simple man. He was surprised by the largeness of the sum presented, and said: "My lord, I only took you to—" "Yes, yes; I know that. But the guinea is for bringing me back."

A Handy Land Measure.

When measuring land it is sometimes necessary or desirable to do the work more accurately than it can be done by pacing. The accompanying cut shows a land measure which can be used by one person to better advantage than a chain or rope by two. The wheel measures just 8 1-4 feet, or half a rod in circumference, and is made of one-inch band iron or of barrel-hoops. The spokes are a cross of light wood an inch square, halved together with a piece of half-inch siding nailed on each side over the joints. These act as washers and make the wheel run more smoothly. To keep the spokes in place nails are driven into the ends through punched holes in the hoop. A quarter-inch hole in the centre to receive the bolt completes the wheel.

The fork is also made of sticks like the spokes, with a short piece for a handle nailed between. This latter should be a little wider than the hoop and rounded off at the end.

As the revolutions of the wheel have to be counted, it is handy to have one of the spokes plainly marked. Paint or a string tied around it will do this. If smaller divisions than half rods are desired, the spokes indicate eighths of a

Flowers Nice to Eat.

The use of flowers, such as rose leaves and violets, for making confections is well-known. Now the nasturtium is treated in a like manner, and the products are received with much favor. This flower and its pungent leaves are said to possess valuable dietetic properties and are classed among the most approved additions for salads and sandwiches to vary the menu.

The latest accession to the dietary list is that favorite fall flower, the chrysanthemum. Those that have tried this flower food proclaim it to be as pleasant to taste as it is beautiful to look upon. Chrysanthemums are served as a salad with a French dressing, or chopped fine with a nicely seasoned cream sauce poured over them. The flowers have a flavor somewhat similar to the cauliflower, but more delicate.

A flower salad that the French consider a great delicacy is made from the young pink and white clover blossoms.

Novelties in Sandwiches.

All bread sandwiches should be made of bread at least twenty-four hours old. The slices should be very thin; the crust should be cut off, and the shape of the sandwich whatever the whim of the maker dictates.

Nothing can be more crisp than lettuce sandwiches. Spread buttered slices of bread with salad dressing, and place between them small lettuce leaves.

To make chestnut sandwiches boil chestnuts until tender, peel and rub through a wire sieve. Butter bread and spread the chestnut paste over it, sprinkling with a little salt.

To make cheese sandwiches spread thin slices of bread with butter and grated cheese, and then slightly toast; put together and serve hot.

Wafer crackers, when spread with grated cheese and slightly browned in the oven, make delicious sandwiches.

The Making of Fruit Jellies.

Apples contain so much pectose that little labor or care is involved in jelly-making. Peaches and pears, and even currants, when over-ripe, contain so little pectose that an experienced jelly-maker may easily fail. Jelly made from currants under-ripe and fresh from the bush will congeal before you can transfer it from the kettle to the tumbler.—Mrs. S. T. Rorer, in Ladies' Home Journal.

Should Exercise Care.

Police Magistrate Daly's contention that the town authorities have not exercised discrimination enough in granting license to itinerate peddlars is well taken. In justice to our town merchants, who do a legitimate business and pay taxes, peddlars whenever possible should be denied a license. Past experience should warrant the authorities in refusing to grant license to this class.

Committed Suicide.

Monday night about 9:30 Miss Sarah Marshall, who lived with her brother-in-law, James Wilson, Thompson's Mills, two miles from Newburgh, was missed from the house. Immediate search was made, and her lifeless body was found in the river near the Thompson Paper Co.'s bulk-head. Miss Marshall was a very estimable lady, 58 years of age. Despondency over ill-heath is supposed to have led her to commit suicide.

A Disastrous Fire.

A disastrous conflagration, attended with loss of life, occured at the Grove Inn, Kingston, early on Saturday morning. It was about 2 o'clock when fire was discovered issuing from Pipe's large ice-house, and in five minutes, owing to the violence of the wind, the blaze was carried to a row of six cottages owned by William Newman. The icehouse and cottages were completely destroyed, the tenants losing their clothing and house-hold effects, and barely escaping from the burning building with their lives. An infant child of Joseph Newman perished. Those who were severely burned are Mrs. Joseph Newman, Mrs. Perry her mother, Miss Edith Newman, William Newman, jun., and Joseph Newman. The two latter were removed to the General Hospital.

Wedding Bells.

The society of our town was all astir on Monday morning at half past seven to witness the marriage ceremony of Miss Eliza Fitzmartyn, daughter of Mrs. S. Fitzmartyn and one of Napanee's favorite young ladies, to Mr. J. Cuningham, merchant, of Tamworth. The ceremony was performed by the Rev. Father Hogan in the R. C. Church. The bride looked pretty attired in cream satin, trimmed with chiffon,and carried a magnificent bonquet of large white roses (a gift she received that morning). She was assisted by Miss Mollie Whalen and Mrs. W. Scanlin, of Enterprise, who also looked pretty in white silk trimmed with chiffon. All wore large white hats. The groom was supported by Mr. S. Fitzmartyn and Mr. W. Scanlin. The bride received many valuable tokens of regard showing the high esteem in which she is held. At the conclusion of the ceremony a reception was held at the residence of her mother in which all participated in an enjoyable manner. The happy couple left amidst a shower of good wishes for Toronto, Niagara, then to Buffalo for a short visit among friends. We extend congratulations.

The Other Side of the Case.

Under the caption "the other side of the case" the Beaver of last week published an interview with the Police Magistrate in reference to his action in dismissing the three flim-flammers who were up before him on Sept. 22nd. THE EXPRESS stated at the time that the Magistrate made an error in allowing the men their freedom when there was such strong presumptive evidence of their guilt and we are still of that opinion. The magistrate avers that his reason for not arraigning them was owing to the questionable nature of the arrest. The following is the interview in question, and Mr. Daly's justification for the action: "I did not arraign them for the following reasons: The questionable nature of the arrest. They were arrested about 8 30 in the evening, without a warrant, for some-

An Unfortunate Find.

One of the men engaged in tearing up the old sidewalk on John St. made a find on Saturday that caused his heart to palpitate with joy. It proved to be no less than seventeen fifty-cent pieces and that evening he and a friend dropped into the Campbell House to celebrate the find over a glass of lemonade. Three of the coins were left there in the course of the evening, and afterwards an adjournment was had to Lahey & McKenty's where he tendered one of the coins in payment for a purchase he had made. It was here discovered that the coins were counterfeits, and the citizen went home to cogitate over the affair. The matter came to the ears of High County Constable Sills and that official thought he had discovered a mare's nest and was in a fair way of winning fame and glory by running to earth a daring gang of counterfeiters. In company with Detective Greer he visited the finder of the coins while he was at his work on Monday morning and after securing the coins they brought him before Police Magistrate Daly. Both Messrs. Sills and Greer scouted the idea that the man had found the coins. The evidence of one of the men engaged on the streets, who witnessed the find, was taken and the Magistrate, who was convinced from the start that the man had passed the coin innocently enough, dismissed the case. Costs, amounting to $1.20, were imposed. It is the general opinion that Mr. Sills was just a trifle over zealous in his prosecution of this case. The finder of the coins is an honest man, whose character is beyond reproach, and if all that the constable desired was to see the ends of justice served he could have accomplished it without bringing the matter before the magistrate.

Charged with Robbing the Dominion Bank and Concealing the Money—Strong Hope of his Innocence Expressed—Remanded to Gaol until To-Day—Detectives are Reticent—The Banks Warned.

On the 30th of August the province was startled by the intelligence that the Napanee brauch of the Dominion Bank had been entered and robbed of $32,000. So cleverly and effectually was all traces of the burglary covered up that nearly three days elapsed before the robbery was discovered and the machinery of the law set in motion.

The facts of the robbery are so fresh in the minds of our readers that it is needless to advert to them further here. Many theories and conjectures have been advanced as a solution of the mystery and the air is full of rumors as to the probable manner in which the job was done. For the past few weeks Geo. L. Dougherty, assistant superintendent of the New York branch of the Pinkerton Detective Agency, George Wilkes, a Pinkerton Detective of long experience, Government Detective Greer, and Clarence Bogart, Inspector of the Dominion Bank, have been in Napanee engaged upon the case and as a result of their labors William H. Ponton, teller in the Napanee branch of the Dominion Bank, was arrested on Tuesday evening.

THE ARREST.

For the past few weeks Mr. Ponton has been under surveillance and the watchful eyes of the detectives have noted his every movement. The young man was cognizant of this, and on Saturday evening he quietly wheeled up to Belleville to acquaint his mother of the fact and to apprise her that she need not feel alarmed or surprised if she learned of his arrest in connection with the robbery. Mr. Ponton was shadowed to Belleville. On Monday evening Mr. E. Gus. Porter, Barrister, of Belleville, visited town and had a conference with Mr. Ponton. On Tuesday evening the blow descended. On Tuesday evening after Mr. Ponton came out from supper at th Paisley House, he was invited over to the bank where Mr. Adams, the new Chief of police, made the arrest. The young man was brought before Police Magistrate Daly, who remanded him to gaol until to-day, (Friday.) He was conveyed to the gaol in a cab, accompanied by detectives Greer and Dougherty, and in charge of Chief Adams. A request that Mr. Ponton be allowed to remain at the Paisley House in charge of two policemen until the trial was refused.

THE FEELING IN TOWN.

The news of the arrest spread like wild-fire and caused great excitement and surprise. A belief in his innocence was generally expressed and confidence is entertained that he will be able to clear himself of the grave charge upon which he stands indicted. Mr. Ponton has been teller in the Dominion Bank here for a little over a year and is a general favorite in town. He was one of the most popular bank clerks ever stationed here and had a cheery word for everybody. He was an enthusiastic sportsman and was identified with the hockey, base ball and foot ball clubs of the town, and deservedly esteemed by his companions. He had no expensive tastes and was in every respect a well-conducted young man. He was a good singer, obliging in his disposition and the life of any company in which he was placed. His friends are loath to believe him capable of the crime with which he is charged and trust he will be able to establish his innocence.

HIS CONNECTIONS.

William Ponton is a native of Belleville where his mother and sisters reside. The family is well connected and are highly esteemed and respected in that city. His father, who has crossed the bar, was at one time registrar of the County of Hastings. The young man is a tall, handsome, athletic blonde, of about 25 years of age. He contributed towards the support of his widowed mother, and was in every way an ideal son. Mr. Ponton was transferred here from Toronto where he held the post of teller in the savings department of the head office of the Dominion Bank. While there he was a member of the Toronto Rugby Club and in 1894 played with the Lornes. The Toronto World says of him:—He was a

The question of the right of lodges to decrease sick benefits is the subject of an appeal in two cases in the Court of Appeals. The Dominion and Forest City lodges of I. O. The appeal is from the decision of Chancellor Bond in favor of the lodges.

On Saturday morning Thomas Thompson, of Moscow, died at the general hospital Kingston, of gangrenous dysentery, a development from typhoid fever. Mr. Thompson was identified with No. 1 company of the 47th batt., which formed part of the force in the recent camp at Barriefield. From camp he was sent to his home by P. M. O. Neilson, as suffering from typhoid fever. He bore the trials of this affliction at his home under medical care, and last week was removed to the general hospital. On arrival the authorities found him in a very weak condition, with his temperature as high as 104 degrees. Death was staring him in the face, and notwithstanding that every advantage of the medical profession was used in his behalf, that wasting affliction brought on his death.

the evening, without a warrant, for something that was claimed to have been done in the afternoon. The charge was vagrancy. I could not discover anything in their dealings that would constitute them vagrants under the act, notwithstanding the County Crown Attorney had made every effort in his power to procure evidence to convict them on this or any other charge. On being taken to the lockup they were found to have a considerable sum of money and two gold watches. This altered the case at once. The constables took them to the Campbell house, and they were treated like gentlemen, of course being under surveillance. Why was this done? If the officers making the arrest had any faith at all in their charge, why were they not left in the lockup? Then look at the insincerity of the charge—arrested on a charge without a shadow of evidence, and it is now admitted that the charge of vagrancy was made only in order to detain them until another charge was laid. I am censured because I did not hold them till evidence could be brought forward sustaining another charge. The only one who could be classed as a gambler was Huffman, for raffling cigars, and he had a license from one of the town councillors permitting him to carry on his calling. Yet we do not hear a word of condemnation of that act. Had the prisoners been arraigned, and for want of evidence been dismissed, they could have then demanded a certificate of discharge, and could not have again been arraigned. Now they are liable to be arrested for any charge when any person will pledge his oath that any of them have been guilty of an offence. If I had committed them to jail I would have made myself a party to a very questionable arrest. If any person can come forward now and prove any offence against any of the parties, they can be arrested at Kingston and produced for trial."

We had no intention of referring further to the matter but as Mr. Daly has seen fit to enter the press in justification of his action we feel constrained to point out a few discrepancies in the Magistrate's presentment of the case. The contention that a tramp or vagrant cannot be legally arrested without a warrant is one that is not borne out by the records. During the progress of the Toronto Fair questionable characters were arrested as soon as they set foot in the city. The fact that the men had money in their possession doesn't disprove vagrancy. The reason given by the constables for not detaining the men in the lockup was that the smoke from the stove and pipes threatened to suffocate them. When Mr. Daly states there was not a shadow of evidence forthcoming he loses sight of the fact that three reputable citizens came forward and identified two of the men as the fakirs who had attempted to work the flim-flam game at their respective places of business. The acting Crown Attorney insisted that the men should be arraigned and as the men were not placed on their trial the magistrate was not in a position to know what evidence of their guilt would have been forthcoming. Mr. Daly's plea that had the men been arraigned and dismissed for want of evidence they couldn't be arraigned for that offence a second time is all true enough, but it only holds good so far as the charge of vagrancy is concerned. They could have been arraigned on a charge of stealing, gambling, etc, if the evidence warranted it. Mr. Daly, no doubt, thought he acted for the best and in view of the fate that overtook a magistrate in this county no one can find fault with him if he exercises care in not making himself a party to a questionable arrest. We formed the opinion at the time that the magistrate made an error of judgment in acquitting the men, but recognizing the trying position in which a magistrate is placed and that to err on the side of leniency is a good trait, we only mildly questioned the wisdom of his action. We believe Mr. Daly entirely misjudged the men before him. We believe they are of the stamp upon whom kindness and good advice are wasted. The Beaver commenting on the attempted highway robbery of R. W. Dennison stated last week:—"After such attempts as this, it is high time that all suspicious characters prowling around should be arrested and compelled to give an account of themselves." The three "suspicious characters" who were arrested on the 21st ult, were not compelled to give an account of themselves and the wisdom of making such characters do so is now apparent.

The Raccoons Were Out in Full Force

Procyon Lotor is called a nocturnal carnivore, but like his relative the bear a variety in diet is appreciated and corn at this time of the year is a favorite with him. It is not often however that we hear of such depredations as the following recounts. A few nights ago a thrifty and prosperous farmer residing about two miles from town said to his son "Henry! Them blame pigs are in the corn again." "Well! I don't see how that can be, I took particular care to secure the little fellows," was the reply. "But just come 'ere and 'ear them a-tearing awhay at the hears of corn." On stepping out of the back door they plainly heard something very much like the noise pigs would make, rattling the husks and munching the corn. Upon visiting the pen Henry was surprised to find the pigs soundly sleeping. It was concluded that the noise was caused by raccoons and there must be a great many. Taking the dog and a club, Henry quietly went around the cornfield getting between it and the wood; then the fun began. The coons, which, sure enough, were the cause of the noise, upon the first bark of the dog, started for the wood. Henry says "They came out of the corn in a regular drove. The dog grabbed one and I went for them with the club, which being rotten, broke the first blow, then I went to kicking and jumping on them. It was rather dark but you could not step without getting on to one. They came running over the mangels and I caught them in the melon patch. I tell you! It was a lively time for a while." "They saw I looked like a runaway hay-tedder and as I kicked them rapidly it sounded like some one beating carpets." "You see when they got through the mangels they seemed to stop and try to hide in the melon vines; that's how I got a kick at so many of them." When asked how many coons he killed he said, "Oh! We got only two, which the dog caught. The ones I kicked were either mighty tough, or I kicked in too fine pieces, to find them." When it was suggested that he might have got excited and was kicking the melons for coons, he became very emphatic in his assertions, that they were raccoons "Why!" he says "My boots were so soaked with coon grease that every time I tried to walk I'd go off on the rack." Henry's father informed us lately that his melons had not turned out very well and he was afraid he'd not be able to give us the usual treat when we take a tramp out that way.

LEADING UP TO THE ARREST.

The detectives engaged upon the case came to the conclusion from the first that the combination of the vault and safe was known to the burglars. The theory that the combination was worked by an expert was placed by them as beyond the realm of probabilities. Starting out with this assumption the employees of the bank were subjected to numerous examinations and their actions were closely watched. What evidence is now in the hands of the Crown is a matter of conjecture. The detectives have been indefatigable in their efforts and all available information bearing on the case is now in their hands. Their efforts to locate the owner of the screw driver which was found at the rear of the bank, has not been crowned with success. The first intimation of impending developments came on Friday night last. Mr. Durand, cashier in the bank, was bundled off to Toronto on the midnight train on Friday night on an hour's notice. On Saturday, Mr. Green, the junior in the bank, received moving orders and on Tuesday evening Mr. Ponton was lodged in gaol. A new set of bank clerks are now installed in the bank.

A TALK WITH THE DETECTIVES.

Detective Wilkes has not been in town since Monday but Detectives Greer and Dougherty are still on the scene. They are very nice gentlemen to talk with but they are not giving news away—in fact its news they're after. We tacked on to Dougherty but he was not in a position to impart anything further than what was known. Mr. Dougherty said he knew the action they had taken was unpopular, but they were there to do their duty, however distasteful it might prove. "I would do all in my power," said the detective, "to exonerate Mr. Ponton if I believed him innocent. I like the young man for he strikes me as possessing good parts." Are any more arrests to follow? we queried. "Well now as to that I'm not at liberty to say. Other arrests may follow." Tonight? "I wouldn't like to say." Mr. Dougherty had a good word to say for the Canadian papers. Coming from a land where yellow journalism is rife he was greatly taken with our newspapers. "They are not sensational and do not go outside of the facts to make a flaring readable article." Detective Greer, of Toronto, who is a genial chap also, wished he was a part of the evidence to be submitted at trial, and they didn't desire to show their hand to the defence at this juncture. The rumors floating around town relative to the matter was all moonshine. Mr. Greer said that only a part of the evidence would be submitted at the preliminary trial on Friday. Other arrests may follow after the trial. Can you produce the stolen money? queried the scribe. "My dear fellow, if we could our trouble would be at an end," said Mr. Greer with a smile. "We have trace of a part of it, however." Detective Dougherty said he didn't know where the rumor had originated that Messrs. Durand and Green were to be brought to Napanee on Wednesday. He understood there was quite a crowd up at the station to meet them. He thought it was unfair to the young men that rumors should go out about them.

PONTON'S LAWYER IN TOWN.

Mr. E. Gus Porter, of Belleville, who will defend Mr. Ponton, arrived in town on Wednesday. He will have associated with him on the case Mr. Wm. Northrup, ex-M.P., also of Belleville. The young man's mother arrived in town on Wednesday. She endeavored to have an interview with her son on Wednesday afternoon, but finding that she could not do so, except in the presence of a detective, she decided, on the advice of her counsel, to forego the pleasure such an interview would afford her.

THE TRIAL.

It is stated that the young man's room in the Grange block was thoroughly searched by the detectives on Wednesday, but what the search revealed, if anything, will not be known until the trial. The trial will take place at the Court house this morning at 10 a.m. and promises to be most exciting. Mr. S. C. Warner, County Crown Attorney, will appear for the Crown and Deroche & Madden, solicitors for the Dominion Bank, will look after the interests of the Bank.

Mr. Green, junior in the Bank, arrived from Guelph last evening and is stopping at the Paisley House. Mr. Durand is expected to arrive on the midnight. A rumor to the effect that a large portion of the stolen money has been recovered was floating around town last evening, but the report lacked confirmation.

Detective Wilkes returned to town last evening. The outcome of the trial will be watched with great interest.

THAT WARNING.

There have been various rumors floating around town, one to the effect that the Manager of the Dominion Bank had received warning sometime prior to the burglary that an attempt would be made to rob the bank. The story, which comes from a reliable source, is as follows:

Some few months ago a lawyer from Belleville visited town on business connected with the assizes. While here he informed the solicitors of the Dominion Bank and several other gentlemen that an attempt would be made to rob one of the banks in town. He averred that a party of men had visited town in the month of May with the avowed intention of robbing the bank. While near Napanee their horses ran away and carried them through town. The men went on to Deseronto, started drinking, disagreed and gave up the idea for the time being. The lawyer said that the same parties contemplated making another attempt and cautioned the bank authorities to be on their guard. He claimed that he had become possessed of the information professionally and was not at liberty to divulge the names. The manager of the Merchants Bank laid the matter before the head officials of the bank, and at the same time informed them that the safe in the Napanee branch was unsafe. Due heed was paid to the warning as an additional nightwatchman was put on at the bank and a new safe was sent up from Montreal. The Dominion Bank authorities were also apprised of the warning but they evidently didn't attach much importance to the matter as no extra precautions were taken.

Wilson was arrested in Cobourg and brought to Napanee. When he appeared before the Magistrate he was minus a coat and his feet were untrammeled with shoes. The evidence of Miss Margaret Sampson, an employee of the restaurant was taken, after which the prisoner elected to be tried before Mr. Daly. Mr. S. C. Warner appeared for the Crown and Mr. John English for the prisoner. The trial will take place on the 12th inst at 10 o'clock.

DEAR MR. AND MRS. HAYCOCK,

We of the Morven choir and members together with you of the Methodist church, view with sincere regret the severance of your connection with our choir, and your removal from our midst. During the past five years, by your faithful devotion to duty, your kind and genial disposition, being always ready to bear your part in any good work both you and Mrs. Haycock have won the merited esteem and affection of all those whose privilege and pleasure it has been to associate with you. As leader of the choir, Mr. Haycock we especially wish to thank you for the able kind and faithful manner in which you have discharged that honorous duty, and we regret much that we are obliged to bid you adieu in that capacity. In parting we beg you to accept these chairs, one for each of you, which we trust will often remind you of your Morven friends, whose most earnest prayer is that happiness and prosperity may attend you ever. Also to our dearly loved friend Mrs. Brown, who by your Christly life and example have been the means of encouraging many and leading them to seek the higher better life and who ever since your illness always endeavoured to do all in your power to help on the cause of our Saviour. We deeply regret your removal from among us. Please accept this small token of our regard with the best wishes of all your Morven friends.

THE MAGISTRATE DISCHARGED HIM.

Ponton Tells His Story—The Defence Side of The Case—Addresses by Counsel—The Demonstrations in His Honor—The Magistrate's Summary.

After a trial extending over seven days, in which a great mass of evidence was adduced, the Bank Robbery Trial came to a close on Saturday evening by the discharge of the prisoner. That the decision was a popular one was evinced by the demonstration that followed the Magistrate's words. Friends gathered around the young man, the crowd cheered and everybody was waiting for an opportunity to congratulate Mr. Ponton on his release.

Mr. Ponton made his way to the Paisley House where a covered carriage was in waiting to convey him to the residence of Judge Wilkison, where his mother had been stopping during the trial. A crowd soon congregated and "Billy" was compelled to stick his head out of the window and make a little speech to his admiring friends, who cheered him to the echo. Then some one said "clear the way boys, he is going to see his mother," and three hearty cheers were given for his mother. Later on the band turned out, and a large crowd armed with tin whistles etc., formed a procession and paraded the principal streets. Short addresses were delivered by Col. Ponton, E. Gus Porter and others. A large number came up from Belleville to participate in the fun, which was of a good natured character. Although the crowd "guyed" the detectives unmercifully there were no demonstrations of violence offered, nor were any intended.

A box was received by the proprietor of the Paisley House, which contained a number of exceedingly ancient hen fruit. It contained the following inscription: "To be presented one at a time to the detectives and the bank inspector. Donated by Kingston Bank clerks. Vintage 1876."

In conjunction with this the following letter was received: "Please buy hup hall the ripe heggs you can to sell hon the day of acquittal that the natives of Hogtown may long remember the sweet scented job they tried to put hup on their country cousine. The last lay won't cost you a scent A re lay for certain nofficious pussons in your midst might as well be kept in stock. Souvineers like To be used when called for.."

The demonstration was marred by the disparaging remarks made about the lady witness for the crown, which were not only unseemly but unjustifiable.

The attendance at the two closing days of the case was large and during the time when counsel were delivering their addresses the court room was crowded to the doors.

FRIDAY.

David M. Young, a safemaker, employed by J. & J. Taylor, has been at the business

Mr. Young visited the Dominion Bank safe during the adjournment for luncheon, and when his examination went on in the afternoon he was questioned about it.

To Mr. Madden he said: "The hole in the vault may have been made one year or six years ago. I believe it could have been made in connection with opening the safe, but not in connection with the combination."

Questioned regarding the key impressions, he said: "I was merely shown the slip of paper when we were discussing the case."

"We'l, why did you fall in with the idea of my learned friend that it was shown you to influence your evidence?" asked Mr. Madden.

"I don't think I did."

To Mr. Porter witness said: "The hole looked to me like a former attempt on the safe, and not as if put there for any legimate purpose. The hole had been drilled, but I cannot say when it was done. I hardly think it was done at the time of this burglary.

This closed the case for the prosecution.

Magistrate Daly asked Mr. Porter if he wished to put in a defence. Mr Porter said he had omitted to ask Mr Baines a few questions and would like to have him recalled.

On Mr. Baines being recalled Mr. Porter said: I omitted to ask you what instructions you gave Mr. Ponton in reference to his cash:—

Mr. Baines—I instructed him to keep what cash he required for the day's business in his box and put the rest back in the safe. That had been Mr. Ponton's practice. The safe and vault combinations were changed in May, 1896, and no other persons but Mr. Durand and myself have had the combination of the safe since.

Kindly state who have had these combinations of the vault since May, 1896?

Mr. St. Johns, Mr. H. J. Hagerty, Mr. F. W. Barron, Mr. P. B. Tucker, Mr. J. Londesborough, Mr. W. H. Green and W. H. Ponton. Mr. Baines said that the specification slip of the teller's cash on the night previous to the robbery found by Mr. Bogart could answer no legitimate purpose. In his twenty years' experience as a teller Mr. Baines had never seen a slip made out in that shape and could see no reason for taking it out of the office. No bank employee had a right to take such a slip out of the bank. A teller had his specifications in his book. A slip like that would be utterly useless to any outsider without an explanation.

The Magistrate then asked Wm. Hamilton Ponton if he had any desire to make a statement, and explained to him the statutory clause in reference to the same.

Mr. Porter submitted that no case whatever had been offered on behalf of the Crown which would be sufficient before any court to put the prisoner upon his trial. It narrowed itself down to three or four points, which might be called salient features of the case. First, the noises heard in the prisoner's rooms by Mrs. McGreer; second, the discrepancy in his cash account; third, the finding of the slip of paper containing the impressions of the key in Ponton's rooms. Mr Porter contended that there should be evidence of guilt other than mere suspicion before it was sufficient to justify the Magistrate in placing the accused on his trial. The Magistrate should start out by believing the prisoner an innocent man until proven guilty. In the investigation any

Two Thankful Letters That Should Be Read By Suffering Men and Women.

For the effectual banishment of rheumatism, sciatica and neuralgia, Paine's Celery Compound is without doubt the best medicine that human science has ever produced. This marvellous remedy, devised by Professor Edward Phelps, M.D., one of the ablest physicians that ever lived, has won the hearty praise of millions of people for the wondrous cures it has wrought in all lands. It is only a medicine with such a record of cures that can attain a world wide reputation. It has saved men, women and children, many of whom had been given up by the doctors. It does its work quickly and well; it eradicates every trace of disease; it builds up, fortifies and makes active every mortal whose limbs have been crippled and deformed by rheumatism, and drives away the terrors of neuralgia.

To-day the ablest doctors are freely proscribing Paine's Celery Compound for tortured rheumatic and neuralgic people. The thankful letters received each year from the cured in every section of Canada would, if published in book form, make a large and interesting volume.

The following letters will surely inspire all rheumatic and neuralgic sufferers with a new and lively hope of a better and happier life. Mrs. F. McMann, of Thorold, Ont., says:

"I think it my duty to let you know what Paine's Celery Compound has done for my husband. For two years he suffered very much with rheumatism in the back, and became so bad that he could not bend, stoop, or sit in a chair at table, and I was obliged to take his meals to him while he lay in bed. He was treated by various physicians, but received no benefit until he used Paine's Celery Compound. The first bottle gave him relief, and after he had used six bottles he was quite free from the rheumatism. He was troubled with piles for fourteen years, and found great relief from the Compound. He says he feels like a new man just now. We think there is no medicine like Paine's Celery Compound."

Mrs. A. Acheson, of Montreal, says:

"Two years ago I suffered intensely from neuralgia in the head, face and shoulders. I was in a terrible condition, and often so tortured that I could not rest or sleep. I became very weak and feeble, and giddy and faint spells, and often could not attempt to go out on the street. My appetite became poor and digestion very weak. At night, while in bed I often had oppressive and smothering feelings; my whole nervous system was run down and very weak.

"I had been under the care of a medical man and used various medicines, but no relief came to me from these sources. I fortunately heard of your Paine's Celery Compound; I decided to give it a trial, and I bless the day I commenced with it. I used it for several months, and now feel as well as I ever did. All my pains have been banished, I sleep and eat well, and find myself a new woman. I heartily recommend Paine's Celery Compound to all who are in need of an honest and true curing medicine."

OBITUARY.

Clarissa J. Wright, relict of the late Geo. B. Sills, passed peacefully away at the residence of her daughter, Mrs. J. W. Edwards, on Saturday last. Deceased was born at Cressy, Prince Edward County, on Feb. 17th, 1819, and was a daughter of the late Capt. James Wright, an officer in the Imperial service. Her late husband George B. Sills, to whom she was married on the 12th of March, 1837, preceded her to the grave about seven years ago. Mrs. Sills was a woman of sterling piety and a consistent member of the Methodist church, for over 50 years. She was a faithful wife and a loving mother and admired and beloved by her large circle of friends and acquaintances for her kindly heart and sweet womanliness. Deceased had resided with her daughter, Mrs. J. W. Edwards, since the death of her husband. For the past few months Mrs. Sills had been in failing health and about six weeks ago she was forced to take to her bed, where she gradually faded away until the messenger called her to her reward. Mrs. Sills was the mother of six children, four of whom survive, viz. Mr. J. Escott Sills, of Rochester, Percival Sills, of Ottawa, Mrs. J. C. Chamberlain and Mrs. J. W. Edwards. The funeral took place on Monday to the western cemetery and was largely attended. The services were conducted by the Rev. Caleb Parker, assisted by the Rev. David Wilson.

Levi Kelly got on another of his periodicals on Wednesday evening. He spent the night in the lockup and in the morning contributed $2 and costs to keep the ball moving. Levi doesn't mind a little thing like that.

Frank Kirk, a painter, fell down the high bank back of Hepburn's storehouse in Picton, on Wednesday night, and was found on Thursday morning. Death must have been instantaneous. He had been drinking. He was about 25 years of age.

Hugh Dougherty and Frank Eaves, two Kingston men, visited town on Tuesday and got on a large sized "jag." They bumped up against Grange's drug store and went through the window. They were gathered in by the Chief and came before Magistrate Daly, who sentenced them to gaol for 20 days in default of paying a fine of $2 each and costs. Their fines were paid on Thursday and the men were granted their liberty.

Special Advice to Ladies Who Contemplate Coloring Cotton Goods.

If a merchant or any one else tells you that package dyes prepared for all wool goods will color cotton goods equally well, do not believe him. A person making such an assertion knows little about dyes and dyeing work.

Vegetable fibres require special dyes. Such dyes are not made by the makers of imitation and common package dyes.

Special dyes for vegetable fibres, such as cotton and mixed goods, are made only by the proprietors of Diamond Dyes, and every color is simply perfection.

These special Diamond Dye cotton colors are great chemical discoveries, and confined entirely to the Diamond Dyes. The colors are sixteen in number, are immensely popular with carpet, rug and mat makers everywhere. Cotton goods dyed with these Diamond Dye Cotton colors never fade in sun or washing.

If you are about to dye cotton goods, or desire to color rags for carpet and mats, be sure and ask your merchant for Fast Diamond Dyes for Cotton and Mixed Goods. He should keep the full variety—

FRIDAY.

David M. Young, a safemaker, employed by J. & J. Taylor, has been at the business 23 years and he said his firm had manufactured the safe and the vault door. He described the locks and material of the safe and found that the last number of the combination had been changed. This had been done by inserting the key on the inner part of the lock and turning it to the left. There is no other way in which that can be done.

It took two and a half hours to open the vault door, and there was no evidence of violence. It would be necessary to have numbers of the combination of the vault to open it. The door was burglar proof. I was able to open the lock by locating the trouble by sound.

After he had been trying to open the safe several times, Mr. Baines gave him the combination and he proceeded to work on the lock. "I located the trouble in from 10 to 15 minutes and found that the safe lock had been tampered with in a manner similar to the vault door lock. My experience on the vault door lock enabled me to open the safe quickly.

This was when the robbery was discovered. On examining the inside of the safe I found that both compartment doors had apparently been wrenched off and both locks, which fastened on the inside, were in the bottom of the safe. Part of each lock remained upon the doors."

Witness here identified the locks exhibited.

He continued: "The lock on the lower compartment was found at the bottom of the safe. The screws with which it had been fastened were also on the bottom of the safe. The cylinder part was screwed on from the outside. The head of one of the screws was broken of. On the lock of the upper compartment there was but slight evidence of force. The bolt was slightly bent and the key would not open the lock. Some of the screws were damaged, and having its head broken and others were bent. The cylinder part of the lock was in good order and still fastened to the door. All the other parts were in the bottom of the safe.

"The upper compartment of the safe was opened first on the night of the burglary, because it would be impossible to wedge the shelf with the upper door locked?"

A week afterwards witness and Detective Greer forced off a dead lock on the lower compartment and screws were damaged and bolt of the lock slightly bent. The locks were Yale treasury locks, not burglar proof. The safe and vault were both burglar proof.

On the vault door the lock was rather out of date, but on the safe it was as good as anyone would want. When the safe was opened the keys of the combination were also lying in the bottom of the safe. There is no evidence that the same force was used in opening the lower compartment as in the upper one. I believe it thoroughly impossible for a man to have opened the safe without knowledge of the combination that would draw aside the bolts.

I have not seen the little hole in the side of the safe and can say nothing about it.

If the combination had not been given you that evening, how could you have got in? asked Mr. Madden.

By cutting open.

Is that the only way to your knowledge? It is.

Cross-examined by Mr. Porter: Would you go so far as to say it can't be done, or that you think it can't be done? asked Mr. Porter.

I'll go so far as to say that it is impossible for it to be done, emphatically declared the witness. The keys of the combination were in most cases kept at the bottom of the safe. It was just a straight key with a wing on.

Could any one with a part of the combination work out the balance? asked Mr. Porter.

Probably so. If observed very closely. By looking over the shoulder of a man, a party might learn the combination, but it was very improbable.

The combination of the vault and safe had not the same revolutions, were entirely different.

A knowledge of opening the vault would give no knowledge of opening the safe? was asked.

None at all.

Would having the key of either or both compartments in the safe be of any use whatever to aid in opening the combination?

Absolutely useless.

When Mr. Young was shown the impression of the keys he said he had been shown the same slip by Detective Dougherty in Queen's Hotel, Toronto, a couple of weeks ago, and it may have been with a

The Magistrate should start out by believing the prisoner an innocent man until proven guilty. In the investigation any reasonable doubt should be extended to the accused by keeping in view these two important elements. Was there one single word or one tittle of evidence that was not as consistent with the prisoner's innocence as with his guilt? Mr. Porter made an eloquent plea for the prisoner's dismissal. There was a murmur of applause when Mr. Porter sat down.

The Chief of Police reminded the crowd that they were not at a concert, but in a court of justice, and if a repetition of the like occurred he would clear the court room.

Mr. H. M. Deroche, Q. C., then pointed out the case against the prisoner. There was no evidence of force on the upper compartment door; the finding of the paper in his rooms containing the impressions of the key of the lower compartment; the noise heard in his room on the night of the robbery, and Ponton's statements in regard to his finances; his failure to take advantage of the opportunities presented to him to make an explanation. He had stooped to deceit and his deceit had got him into trouble. Was it reasonable that a clerk on a salary of $48.50 per month would forget inside the month having paid so large an amount as $15 and more, especially as that payment had been made to his mother? Mr. Deroche referred to Mr. Ponton's betrayal of the interests of his employers in taking outsiders into the bank at unreasonable hours for the purpose of playing poker. The finding of the slip of paper containing the amount of good money on the night preceeding the robbery was also adverted to. That could only have been taken out of the bank for an illegitimate purpose. He claimed there was sufficient evidence put in to call for an answer from the accused.

Mr. Porter again addressed the court, reviewing the evidence reverting to the fact that the accused was a poor man and had been thus singled out. He asked that he be discharged. A large number of the prisoner's sympathizers and friends were reduced to tears while Mr. Porter was speaking.

Magistrate Daly pointed out that the remarks would be more pertinent if he was trying the case. They had deprived him of that privilege by the election. He was there to decide if a prima facie case had been made out. The accused might put in a defence; he was bound to hear it, if he was not in a position to balance the evidence. The Crown may have only put in a small portion of their evidence, and if the accused made an explanation he would be in a position to balance the evidence.

Mr. Porter asked if the defence made an explanation after the Magistrate was satisfied a prima-facie case had been made out, and it was satisfactory to the Magistrate, would it lead to the dismissal of the case?

The Magistrate did not see it in that light. If, after a prima facie case had been made out, the accused put in a defence he would have to go on and take the balance from the prosecution.

Further comment followed, and finally County Crown Attorney Warner pointed out that in a case of this character the prisoner could put in a defence by explanation, but not by contradictions.

Magistrate Daly said that if the prisoner desired to make an explanation and after hearing it he chose to change his mind, the accused would have the benefit of it.

W. H. Ponton, upon being sworn, said as follows:—I identify the slip of paper produced; I have seen it before; I evidently made it out at some time. It is a specification that I make out every night when I balance my cash. It shows the amount on hand at the end of the day. The figures 16 and 1 were put in first and indicate what cash I had in the safe on the day when the slip was made out. The other figures indicate what I had in my cash balance at 3 p.m. I used one of these every night. These figures were not put there for any other purpose. I cannot tell what the figures on the back of the slip indicate. I had been writing my debit and credit on the back of the slips. If there were any differences in the cash I usually carried the slip in my vest pocket over night, when it would be thrown in the waste-paper basket. When there was no difference in my cash

THE Kingston Bank Clerks who forwarded the superannuated hen fruit to Napanee, with a request that they be presented to the detectives, will never be suspected of robbing a bank. Suggestive jokes of this character show neither intelligence nor good senre.

THE ribald jests made at the expense of the lady witness for the Crown does no credit to the town. A moment's reflection will show the danger of encouraging such outbursts. We are all anxious to see wrongdoers punished but if a hienous offence were committed to-morrow and some woman in town was possessed of the desired information that would lead to the conviction and punishment of the criminal she would hesitate in coming forward in view of the experience of Mrs. McGreer. No one doubts the honesty of the lady in question, nor is it even hinted that she was actuated by unworthy motives. She gave her testimony with evident reluctance and as she stated "was sorry that she knew as much as she

I left the slips under the teller's sponge, and they would be placed in the waste-paper basket by the caretaker. I did not have this piece of paper in Mrs. McGreer's room, and had no opportunity of doing so on the night of the burglary. I left the hotel after supper, and went to the Dominion Bank, where I lit the gas. I then went down to the Merchants' Bank, and met Mr. Smith, junior clerk. I spoke to him for a while. He left me and went to the station on his wheel, and I met Sam McCoy at the Campbell House, and went up to the Dominion Bank and listened to the band playing on the market square. I left McCoy there and went over to the Paisley House, where I remained until a few minutes after the band stopped playing. I then went down to the Merchants' Bank again. I stopped there talking to Mr. Coates, Mr. Smith and others. Then Smith got tired, and wanted to go to bed, and I walked down with Mr. Coates, as far as the railway bridge. After talking for a while I left him and came back to the Tichbourn House corner when I met Nightwatchman Perry and E. Rowland Hawley. I went up to the Paisley House, and, after being there for some time, I got a jug of water, and went to my rooms in the Grange block. This would be between 11.30 and 12 o'clock. I told Detective Hodgins in our first interview that it was 12 o'clock. There was nobody in my room when I arrived there. I found my room in its usual condition. I went to bed immediately on my arrival. I undressed myself. The light was put out when I went to bed. The windows of my room were up. After going to bed, I slept till morning, and got up about 8 o'clock. From the time I entered my room until I left in the morning about 8 o'clock I was not out of my room. There was no person in my rooms that night, neither male nor female, nor of any kind or description. I made no noise in my rooms that night that I know of. I came to Napanee in November. I have heard during the course of this trial the evidence of Mrs. McGreer, and cannot account for the noises being in my rooms. From last November up to the time of my arrest I have not spent any money that was not my own. When I left Toronto and came to Napanee I had in the neighborhood of $80, which I had saved from my salary and from an accident policy I had received. I saved the money to buy a bicycle. I bought a bicycle in the spring from Mr. Normile. I did not use the money that I had saved in Toronto to buy a bicycle or for any purpose after I came down here in the spring. My salary was sufficient for my ordinary expenses. I incurred a few accounts in Napanee. My only object for doing so was to pay for my bicycle in $10 payments and at the same time save my money. I had paid those debts eventually, part of them with my salary and part with the money that I had saved. I paid all the accounts within a short time, because I saw that I could not save the money and keep up my payments on the bicycle without putting off my debts indefinitely. My mother had also requested me to pay the money I owed for my clothes. The cheques produced in court are mine, and my object in keeping them was as receipts. I paid the cheques with my own money when presented, and there was nothing contrary to the ordinary mode of procedure of the bank.

I was first interviewed on the Monday following the robbery by a detective. I was interviewed by detectives several times about my finances. The detectives have said that I positively denied having sent money to my mother. I told them that I did not remember having sent any. I told Mr. Bogart that I had saved money. I did not wish the officials to know I was saving money on my salary, as I was afraid if they learned that I would never get above it. My reason for not giving the detectives the correct information was that I could not remember all the money I had paid out. I told them all I could remember. I told Detective Dougherty in Mr. Bogart's presence that if I had access to the ledger and other bank books I would make out a statement of my finances for him. He did not request me to do so. He said, "You could possibly bring it out all right." I told him I certainly could. When the detectives first asked me about my finances I thought it rather an impertinence their asking me. I did not make a full disclosure of my finances to them for that reason.

I never saw the piece of paper with the impressions of the key on it until it was produced in court. I never put those imprints upon that paper. I have no knowledge from any source, by whom, how or when they were put on there, nor for what amounted to about $40 or $50. He paid $14 per month for his board.

You are in the habit of sending money to your mother?

Yes. Usually sent her $10 per month—sometimes by cash and sometimes sent a cheque.

Did you make any money betting on races in 1896?

Yes. I made about $30.

You had a letter of introduction to Judd Sewell, while in Toronto?

Oh, I see they have been going through my clothes again. That man Dougherty is a first-class robber.

You swear to that, do you?

No, I simply gave it as an opinion.

Would you be surprised to learn that it was not Mr. Dougherty at all that secured the letter?

I only presumed so. I take it all back.

Now then, you got a letter of introduction from Frank Jackson to Judd Sewell.

Where is Jackson now?

I presume he is in South America. I did not use the letter.

When did you last hear from him?

I have no recollection of the last letter I received from Frank Jackson. I used to correspond with him.

Do you ever remember receiving a letter from him with the words—"Don't be afraid, arrest, warrant," or anything like that.

I don't remember.

Long time ago since I heard from Frank Jackson. He was in Boceas Del Toro, South America, when I last heard from him.

I don't know what Jackson's business was. I have known him for some time, both in Orillia and Toronto. He was doing something in the fruit line. I was transferred from Orillia to Toronto in the spring of 1895 and he came to Toronto from Orillia in the fall. Jackson followed no business in Canada. He was a regular sport. Never played poker with him. Jackson trained for a race, a cross country run, to see if he could break a record. He ran one race and broke the record and gave it up. I bet on the Fitzsimmons fight and lost $4. When I left Toronto I had $80 in cash. I had an I O U for $25 in the bank which I was stuck for when I was leaving Toronto. Jack Guilett pressed on me to take the $25 and pay it to him in $5 instalments. Judge Sewell is a well-known sporting character and had been introduced to him once. Did not know that he was once in the Bank of Commerce and had been discharged.

Mr. Madden referred to Ponton's having had an I.O.U. in his cash while he had $80.

You used the bank's funds in preference to your own: just drawing ahead on account for salary.

I will swear I had about $80 in my pocket-book at the time, and when I raised the amount of the cheque to $35 I still had the money in my pocketbook. I took $10 from my pocketbook, $25 for Ritchie and Tolton and McKay and $15 to reduce the cheque.

Will you swear you did not tell Bogart on Aug. 31 that you had about $20?

I told him I had over $20. I will swear I did not tell Bogart I had not sufficient money to meet the note. Had no other source of getting money besides salary and pocketbook.

I was spoken to about the $35 I.O.U. by Bogart when the inspection was made. I reduced it then to $20. On 31st of August I told Bogart and Mr. Dougherty that I had over $20. I swear I did not tell Mr. Bogart that I had no money to take up due bill on 13th or 14th of Sept.

This $25 cheque you were stuck for by a Mr. Wilson while in Toronto, did you ever get paid for it?

Wilson paid $5 on the cheque some time ago.

How, by registered letter?

I'm not sure. It may not have been by registered letter.

When did you get it?

I got the letter sometime in the spring.

What did you do with it?

I put the letter in the waste paper basket.

NAPANEE, FRIDAY, OCT. 22nd 1897.

NAPANEE has trials of her own.

THE question still agitating the public is, who robbed the bank?

MARRIED men's chorus: "Our wives were so busy last week courting that we had to cook our own meals."

THERE is strong presumptive evidence that Greer took that fence which he was on, with him when he left town.

WHEN it is stated that there are over forty three million different ways in which a four geared combination can be worked, the thing looks easy.

WHEN Detective Dougherty was urging upon Mr. Ponton to "cough it up," was he seized with the idea that the accused had swallowed the $32,000.

THE Ponton trial was conducted in a manner that reflects credit on the counsel. Mr. Madden conducted his cross examination with marked ability and moderation and Mr. Porter was equally able and moderate.

THE spontaneous outburst of enthusiasm that followed the release of Mr. Ponton was natural under the circumstances. It was but a vent to the pent up feelings of his friends, who prejudged the case, and were convinced of his innocence from the start. As their enthusiasm exhausted itself in cheers, and no harm was done to anyone, even the most captious cannot find fault with the boys for rejoicing sorry that she knew as much as she did about the matter."

We direct the attention of our readers to the notice in another column, signed by E. J. Davis, Provincial Secretary, and having respect to the Ontario Companies' Act which renders it in incumbent upon every Extra-Provincial Company to make to the Provincial Secretary on or before the 1st of November, 1897, a statement, under oath, showing certain particulars respecting the company. As there is a penalty for default in this behalf it is imperative for companies to govern themselves according to the provisions of the act. With a view to securing uniformity in the returns, the Provincial Secretary's department will, upon application, supply to any Company a copy of the form, which has been printed for the purpose.

CHALLENGE ACCEPTED.

(To the Editor of THE EXPRESS.)

DEAR SIR:—A very serious omission was made in printing my communication. Some of the most essential words were left out. You will greatly oblige by making the necessary correction. It should have read:—I am authorized by one of the oldest, and most esteemed and respected residents of this place, Mr. Wm. Ovens, to say, that he told J. W. Edwards to his face that if he were trustee he would not hire him (Edwards). The words omitted contain the real reply to his challenge, and I may add that Mr. Edwards can face Mr Ovens any day, and when he does he will be looking into the face of a good honest truthful man, whose word would never be doubted by anybody who knows the man, which I am sorry to say is not the case when he looks into his mirror.

Yours truly,
N. A. ASSELSTINE.

Her Husband—That's what makes it heaven.—The Yellow Book.

She—I know that I am not good-looking, but people forget my face when I sing.

He—Won't you sing now?—Fliegende Blatter.

His Side of It.

"The great trouble with you women," said Mr. Bobson, "is that you're all egotists. Why do you worry so much over the hang of your skirts? Because you think that other people are all looking at you and studying your make-up. Why are you always worrying because your hat may not be on straight? Same old egotism again. Why do you almost go crazy when you come home and find a speck of soot on your nose? Simply because you think that everybody saw it and was sorry for you, when the chances are about ninety-nine to one that nobody ever noticed it. Never until she gets over this habit of thinking that all the world is always looking at her will woman be able to take her place upon the high plane that is occupied by man. Never until—"

"Excuse me, William," Mrs. Bobson interrupted, "I suppose it really doesn't make any difference to you, but your necktie has worked away around under your left ear."

Mr. Bobson reached the mirror at a bound, thought of the people who had looked at him with such evident interest while he was on his way home in the car, wondered if the necktie was what had attracted their attention, and ate such a light dinner that his innocent little wife told him she was sure he must be ill, and wanted to give him a dose of medicine.—Cleveland Leader.

ONE HONEST MAN.

Dear Editor.—Please inform your readers, that if written to confidentially, I will mail, in a sealed letter, particulars of a genuine, honest, home cure, by which I was permanently restored to health and manly vigor, after years of suffering from nervous debility, sexual weakness, night losses and weak shrunken parts. I was robbed and swindled by the quacks until I nearly lost faith in mankind, but thank heaven I am now well, vigorous and strong, and wish to make this certain means of cure known to all sufferers. I have nothing to sell and want no money, but being a firm believer in the universal brotherhood of man, I am desirous of helping the unfortunate to regain their health and happiness. I promise you perfect secrecy. Address with stamp, WM. T. MULFORD, Agents' Supplies, P.O. Box 59, St. Henri, Que.

when they were put on there, nor for what pupose there were put on. I know nothing about them. It was not made by my contrivance. I have no knowledge of how or by whom the burglary was committed. It was not counselled, aided or abetted by me in any manner whatever.

Mr. Ponton was subjected to a severe cross examination by Mr. Madden.

Where were you on the night before the robbery, Mr. Ponton?

I cannot state.

What time did you retire on the night before the robbery?

I presume I retired that night about 11 o'clock.

You don't know?

No.

Where were you the night previous to that, the 25th?

I cannot tell you.

On the night of the 24th?

I cannot tell.

Your mind is a blank on these nights. Where were you on the night of the 23rd?

It would be simply impossible for me to tell where I was these nights.

Will you swear you were not in the bank that night?

I lighted the gas in the bank on the night of the 27th.

Where were you on the Monday following the robbery?

I don't remember.

Were you drinking with Hawley in the Paisley House on the night of the robbery?

I believe I had two drinks and a cigar.

How much did Hawley have?

About as much as he could stand.

He can stand a good deal?

You bet he can.

Who else did you have drinks with that night.

Smith, Coates, McCoy and Hawley were the only ones I could have had drinks with, but I don't remember drinking with the others.

Did you know Mrs. McGreer was in her rooms on the night of the robbery?

I did not.

Did you use the window in the rear of the hall in going from the rooms?

I used the window in the rear of the hall quite often in the afternoons and may have used it at night.

Mr. Madden then questioned the accused about his personal expenditure—his laundry bill, tobbacco, cigars, etc.

You had ale for dinner, Mr. Ponton?

Yes. A little jug full of it every day.

How much did that cost you?

Not a cent.

You were at Orillia this year, Mr. Ponton?

Yes. I was there three days. I went down to see the Gaudaur and Rogers sculling match on May 25th. I took in Belleville and Trenton on the way down.

Who are your associates in Belleville?

Harry Dey. H. McGuiness, Henry Thomas.

Any more?

The boys in the bank, of course.

Can you give me another?

Chas. Laidlaw.

Another?

I knew everybody in the town.

Give me one more Mr. Ponton?

Geo. Brown.

Another one please?

Oh, I'll let it go at that.

When did you leave Napanee on the Orillia trip?

On Friday night, may 21st. I stopped over night at my home in Belleville.

How much money did you take with you to Orillia?

I don't know. I had enough to see me through.

Did you take that little pocket book with you?

No, I left it in Napanee.

How much was there in the pocket book when you left?

There was about $80 in the pocket book when I left for Orillia.

How long did you remain in Toronto?

From Saturday morning until the evening.

Where did you go while in Toronto?

I went to the Woodbine to see the Queen's plate run off.

With whom?

Jack Juilett.

Did you do any betting?

No, I did not bet.

Mr. Ponton said that on Saturday night he left for Orillia, when he met Geo. Rapley, Henry Warren, and some of the boys, who were at the station to meet him. He stopped with Rapley at his rooms. He could not say how much he spent on the Orillia trip.

When did you save this money you speak of?

In April, 1896, I received $70 on an accident insurance policy and had saved about $100 during my convalescence. He

I put the letter in the waste paper basket.

Were you afraid the letter could be traced, if you said it was registered?

No.

Did you tell Dougherty that you received no money from any other source than your salary?

I may have but I was only speaking from recollection.

The accused admitted to Madden that he had $80 lying in his little pocket book since last November earning nothing, his account with Tolton & McCoy had been running since last spring and his bill with Ritchie & Co. since last winter and had been bilied once or twice for it. Tolton & McCoy had drawn on him once and he had returned the draft.

The accused looked distraught and his answers were very unsatisfactory. When Mr. Madden said it is now seven o'clock and that an adjournment would be acceptable his friends gave a sigh of relief at the respite.

Court adjourned until 10 a.m.

SATURDAY.

The cross examination of W. H. Ponton was continued this morning.

To Mr. Madden he said: "Knew Geo. Ritchie, but did not remember seeing him in July. Remember getting a letter from Ritchie. Don't remember that they said they were going to draw on him. Don't remember if Ritchie drew on me on 21st of July and I sent draft back after putting on the back of it, will write.

Paper produced and identified as in the handwriting of Fred Jackson. The letter was one Jackson gave him as an introduction to Judd Sewell.

Didn't remember his bets.

Questioned as to the horses he bet on but could not remember which horses he had bet on.

This document from Jackson to Sewell was not given to me or used for the Queen's plate last spring. It was used in 1895. The letter is as follows:—Dear Judd, if you have anything good up your sleeve for to-day put Ponton on to it for me like a good fellow. I was in to see you a couple of times at the Wanderers but you were "out." Ponton is no talker so you can count on him being strictly O K. I can't get down myself to-day so he is doing a little on the side for me. Will try and see you Tuesday. Yours truly,

Frank W. Jackson.

I was not doing a little for Mr. Jackson. I don't know when it was written but I see it is written on a Dominion Bank cheque. I didn't furnish Jackson with the cheque. I spoke of going to South America with Jackson when I was in Orillia as he held out such flattering inducements of the prospects there. Never complained of the salary I was getting to the bank and did not apply for a rise. I was ledger keeper at Orillia but was not in possession of the combination. My sparring associates in Belleville were Geo. Brown, Joe Cox, Jim Hanrahan. I gave my mother money in my room in Napanee on 31st of August. Never heard of a man named Charles Comskey. I never told my mother or any body else that I had saved $80 and had it in my little pocketbook. When I went over to my rooms with Detectives Greer and Wilkes to get the money, my little pocketbook was in the bureau drawer. I took the twenty dollars out of there. The money I returned to the pocketbook. The little pocketbook is now in Belleville I took it up and left it there when I went home. I took the money out of the pocketbook when Greer and Wilkes were in the outer room and left the pocketbook in my handerchief drawer. Dougherty took the $20 and the pocketbook does not now contain the same $20. They asked me to turn out my pockets and I refused because it was an impertinent thing for them to ask me. I had been carrying a portion of the money around in my pocket. I don't remember how much I took out of my pocketbook. Don't remember having paid any money by cheque and did not pass it through the savings account except the cheques in court. Could give no instance when he had given cheques and paid the bills when presented prior to the robbery. I had paid current accounts by cheque when presented at the bank before.

Normile's instalment on the bicycle had previously been paid through the Savings Bank branch. He at all times had the $80

I saved the $80 to buy a bicycle but subsequently bought it on the instalment plan.

If I had not had to take up the $85 in the bank I would have paid for my bicycle out of my salary and paid $5 instalments on my account and would still have had the $80 in cash. Messrs. Bogart and Dougherty asked me if I had saved any money. I will swear positively that I didn't tell them I had not saved any money. I remember telling them that I had saved over $20. I meant by that exactly what I said and allowed them to infer what they liked.

If his doctor's bill in Toronto had been $54 he would not be surprised.

Who had last been in your rooms on the night of the 27th?

Myself.

Was there a man in your room four week previous to the robbery until four o'clock?

No. He never had a man in his rooms up to as late as four o'clock in the morning.

I was dissatisfied with my salary in the bank. I knew Mr. Durand was coming home on the Saturday after the robbery. Durand and I were good friends. Hung around hotels a good deal and did a little drinking, but never to excess. Would go over to the bank occasionally. On the occasions when we played poker in the bank Durand never opened the vault. The safe would never be opened on these occasions. I locked the safe when Mr. Baines was away.

How often had you and Durand been in the bank playing poker?

A couple of times during the summer. We played till about 11 o'clock on the first occasion.

Who were with you?

Chas. Dewey, Jno. Cheetham, Durand and myself.

Who were with you on the second occasion?

Durand was there, Mr. Stapleton, a baseball pitcher who was staying with some relatives down at Fredericksburgh. He left shortly after we played Yarker, on bicycle day in July. Green may have possibly been there. Occasions when the vault was opened to get coppers out for and it is composed of lager and ginger beer, half and half. I do not get intoxicated.

He drew $145 from the bank as salary during the 14 weeks he was in Toronto. Also laid up $70 from the insurance. His expenditure was: Board, $42: doctors bill $55: total, $97, leaving a surplus of $118. The $18 would cover any incidental expenses.

I am between 24 and 25 years of age.

I never saw the inside of a combination lock until Mr. Young took the cap off of it and showed it to me after the robbery. My view of matters was if I could pay things out of my salary I could save the $80.

To Mr. Madden:—

Were you ill treated by these detectives?

I was not well treated by these detectives.

How were you ill treated?

By putting me under such cross examinations.

Can you give one instance, Sir, where you were unfairly treated by the detectives?

I can.

Well do so then?

Well when I went up to Belleville on a Saturday night I walked across the street and there stood Wilkes. I was under police surveillance.

Is that all?

Well, yes.

Did Mr. Dougherty not tell you that if you had made a mistake, and wished to make a change, or take anything back you could do so?

Yes.

Was not that fair treatment?

That may be fair enough, but Mr. Dougherty cross examined and Mr. Dougherty cross examining are two very different people.

Beyond the cross examinations have you complaint to make at the way the detectives used you?

I complain at the way they used me.

To Mr. Porter:

Mr. Livesly, of Napanee, went with me to arrange for Stapleton's board at the Paisley House, so that he could play ball at Napanee. I wanted to get a good ball

WALKING BACKWARD

ITS DIFFICULTIES AND HUMORS IN THE PRESENCE OF ROYALTY.

A Court Art That is Somewhat Difficult to Acquire—An Incident in the Career of the Duke of Argyll—Due to the Late Prince Consort.

Among the many peculiarities of etiquette at the monarchical courts of Europe there is none that is more strange than the walking backward. It is an accomplishment—nay, one might almost describe it as an art—that is by no means easy to acquire, and yet which is indispensable to those who are called upon to bask in what is known as the sunshine of royalty. Nowhere is it carried to greater perfection nor more frequently practiced than at the court of Queen Victoria.

It is scargely necessary to state that the walking backward constitutes a token of profound respect. It is an art of homage that men of the old regime in Europe still accord to every great lady of their acquaintance when they back out of her presence at the conclusion of a call, and is based upon the doctrine that it is discourteous to ever turn the back toward any one that is entitled to deference. The turning the back upon a person is to such an extent a demonstration of disregard and contempt that it has even come to be used as a figure of speech for the expression of aversion, and hence it is not unnaturally forbidden by the etiquette of most of the courts of Europe in the presence of royalty. At Berlin, at Rome, and at the courts of some of the more modern and minor dynasties the rule is not so strictly observed, and in the Prussian capital, as well as at the Quirinal, I have often watched the great dignitaries of the imperial and royal households marching, wand of office in hand, at the head of the procession, turning their gold embroidered backs full upon the anointed of the Lord, who followed in their wake. But at Buckingham palace, at Windsor, or at St. James' the Lord Chamberlain, the Lord Steward and the other officers of state invariably precede either the sovereign or her children, walking backward, keeping their faces toward royalty and their backs to the remainder of the world.

Let any one try to walk backward along the full length of a big hall, bowing every few steps, never looking backward, and yet keeping in the proper direction—all the more important to preserve, since the officials thus walking backward lead the royal procession—and he will see how difficult it is to preserve either one's dignity or one's bearings. And very often the walking backward has to be done not merely on the level, but also up and down steps and stairs, which is even still more arduous, and requires an immense amount of practice. Indeed, those not accustomed thereto sometimes come to grief in the same manner as the Duke of Argyll. On one of the rare occasions on which Queen Victoria presided at the opening of Parliament in person, the Duke of Argyll, who was then Lord Privy Seal, had to walk backward before her majesty from the throne to the door of the House of Lords. The Duke, who was a very tall man, had not practiced sufficiently, and when he reached the top of the steps leading down from the throne he tripped and fell backward, rolling down the whole flight of steps. The Queen, who was a witness of the accident, was much concerned, and when the Duke had picked himself up she asked him if he had hurt himself. "Only my dignity, your majesty," was the reply.

The Duke of Argyll was the husband of the Princess Louise, and the Queen was very much attached to her son-in-law. Prince Albert, the Prince Consort, was also very much attached to the Duke, and it was he who first introduced him to the Queen. The Duke was a young man at the time, and was a member of the household of Prince Albert. The Prince Consort was very much pleased with the young man, and he was invited to dine with the royal family. The Duke was very much impressed with the Queen, and he was very much pleased with her. The Queen was very much pleased with the Duke, and she was very much pleased with him. The Duke was very much pleased with the Queen, and he was very much pleased with her. The Queen was very much pleased with the Duke, and she was very much pleased with him.

A BOY'S SUFFERINGS.

ATTACKED WITH INFLAMMATORY RHEUMATITM AT AN EARLY AGE

Each Successive Year Brought Fresh Attacks With Increasing Severity Until He Was a Physical Wreck.

From the Sun, Belleville.

Mr. and Mrs. W. R. Kelly are people who are deeply grateful for a kind intervention of Providence whereby the life, health and happiness of their twelve year old son, Master Harry, has been restored and preserved. Mr. Kelly is one of the best known conductors on the Midland divison of the G.T.R., and is now residing in this city. A Sun reporter having heard of the cure of the little fellow and the joy of his parents, called at their home and was met by Mrs. Kelly, who on being informed of the object of his visit at once told the story of the cure and how the results were attained. We were living in Madoc when our boy was about five years of age and in the spring I went to call him one morning. He replied to my call by saying he could not rise. I at once went to him and found that he was unable to walk. Medical aid being summoned we discovered that inflammatory rheumatism had our little boy in its grasp. All that attention and doctors could do was done and the attack passed off, but the following spring while in Peterboro he was again seized with the dread disease and again we were in terrible dread of losing the child. When the warm weather came again he rallied, but was very weak and only a shadow of his former self. Despite all we could do he was again attacked in the next spring. You can imagine the fear and possibly been there. Occasions when the vault was opened to get coppers out for chips was before Stapleton was in the bank. Stapleton came from Oshawa. I had made arrangements with Mr. Douglas for Stapleton's board for one week. That bill has not been paid. Stapleton may have been here during August. Had talked of going to the Klondike in Smith's jewellery store. We talked of going in the spring, but it was not contemplated seriously. This would be in July. Had talked about it with Jno. T. Grange, Wm. Smith, Melvin Taylor and others. I have played poker over in Durand's rooms. I have played in some private houses in the town. Had played on a steamboat going down the river. Came out about even in poker. I offered to make out a statement of my finances to Mr. Dougherty and Bogart. They never asked me to do so. I had every opportunity of making it out as the books were at my disposal, but as they did not request it I did not make it out. The key of Mr. Baines compartment of the safe would be kept in my pocket when the treasury was locked on the occasion when it was in my possession.

To whom did you give your key to enter your room on the night of the robbery?

To no one.

Where were you on the Sunday following the robbery?

I got up about 10 o'clock and after breakfast went up to the park for a walk with Wm. Smith. In the afternoon went from my rooms with Stewart Lockridge and Green. There were no noises like boxing up anything in my rooms on the Sunday morning following the robbery nor like driving nails either.

To Mr. Porter.—

He had been crossexamined very many times by the detectives and to the best of his ability answered them truly. He was speaking entirely from memory. He was trying to keep his $80 intact. Otherwise found it hard to save money from his salary. Had no knowledge of the combination of the safe, nor no knowledge of figures being on the calender. The acquaintance of the boys mentioned formed for no illegal purpose. Detectives asked him impertinent questions during the interviews. They asked so many he could not recall them.

Were any threats or force used to you at any time by the detectives?

There were some such as I found I had made a mistake any time or wished to take anything back or fix it up in any way I could do so. There were insinuations made but he could not give the words. Had told Bogart about the accident insurance policy. His drink was shandygaff Paisley House, so that he could play ball at Napanee. I wanted to get a good ball team here, and he was a good player. I think I have heard the expression 'cough it up.' It was used by Mr. Dougherty in connection with this question to me regarding the bank robbery. He used several such expressions.

Mr. Porter asked witness if he had a guarantee bond with the bank, and received a reply to the effect that he had not personally. The bank had a guarantee fund, for which $1.50 per month went from witness' salary, but he was not very well posted on the objects of the fund.

To Mr. Madden witness said that a bond or an application in a guarantee company was once presented to him by Mr. Evan Begg, of the Bank of Toronto, and at the request of the bank he signed it. The bank arranged it all.

Mr. Madden asked what other expressions besides "cough up" had been used by Dougherty and when and where such expressions had been made.

Witness could not think of what the other expressions were, and could not remember anything offensive being said when a third party was near.

Here Magistrate Daly said to the Attention is called to the ad of J. Y. Egan in another column. Mr. Egan is the leading Hernia Specialist in Canada and those suffering from rupture should avail themselves of his visit to Napanee. He may be seen, and consulted free at the Paisley House, Friday, Saturday, November, 5 and 6. Read the following testimony from your own neighborhood:

DEAR SIR—The instrument you fitted on me during your visit to Picton succeeded beyond my most ardent expectations. As a hotel man I had to be on my feet most of the time, weighing about two hundred pounds and my rupture being of long standing and as my physician intimated "a really serious case" caused me much anxiety and suffering. Having tried all the trusses in the market and none would even hold me for one hour. I had about abandoned every hope. I wore your grand appliance continually with great comfort. It held me from first to last and never shifted its position as all others did. I am now as sound as ever and can indulge in the heaviest exercise with perfect safety. I would strongly advise all sufferers from rupture not to postpone their case but call on you at once and be rid of this dangerous affliction.

manner as the Duke of Argyll. On one of the rare occasions on which Queen Victoria presided at the opening of Parliament in state she was attended by the Duke, who, doing duty for the nonce as lord high steward of the realm, carried the crown on a velvet cushion. At the conclusion of the ceremony, during which he had occupied a place on the dais of the throne in the House of Lords, he proceeded to move backward from the presence of Her Majesty. He forgot, however, the steps of the dais, and when he reached the edge of the latter he fell backward all huddled up in his long and heavy crimson-barred red peer's robes from the folds of which he was extricated with difficulty. The crown shared in the mishap, for it rolled from its cushion to the ground, and a number of the stones dropped out. The Queen, whose face showed more concern than amusement, although the gravity of those about her was sorely taxed by the spectacle presented by the "Cock of the North" (as his grace is styled in Scotland in consequence of his somewhat strutting gait), spoke a few kindly words, expressing her hope that he was not hurt.

Sometimes this walking backward gives rise to rather pretty and even pathetic devices on the part of those who desire to avoid accidents such as happened to the Duke of Argyll. Thus I can recall the case of a relative, who, in turn for active service, was summoned with several brother officers to Buckingham palace in order to receive from the hands of the sovereign herself the Order of the Bath. He had lost his right leg in action so near to the hip joint that there was no means of wearing an artificial limb, and he was consequently dependent upon his crutches. When he entered the royal presence it was noticed that he held fastened apparently to the head rest of each crutch a couple of lovely bouquets. At a third of the distance up the long room he stopped, made the regulation bow as best he could and dropped one of the bunches of flowers on the floor. Then he made his way to the Queen, tendered her the other bouquet, which she graciously accepted, received his Order of the Bath, which she herself fastened to his uniform with many a kindly word (for he had been a favorite of her husband), and then he proceeded to withdraw from her presence. If ever there was a case in which the walking backward might have been excused, it was there, and the faces of the Queen and those around her betrayed signs of concern and anxiety lest some mishap should overtake the Colonel. He, however, backed away, displaying himself some hesitation and anxiety until he reached that part of the room where he had purposely left the first bouquet on the ground. That gave him his bearings. He knew where he was then, and leaving the flowers there, reached the door in safety, the Queen kindly nodding and waving her hand to him in appreciation of his somewhat arduous act of homage. That Her Majesty was moved thereby was shown by the fact that a few days later he received from the Queen a rather unusual present, namely a handsome carriage and a pair of horses, together with an expression of the wish that the conveyance might in some measure tend to alleviate the discomfort caused by the absence of the limb which he had lost in her service on the field of battle.

There was a considerable amount of walking backward at the English court previous to the accession to the throne of Queen Victoria, but nothing like as much as there is at present. Indeed, royalty nowadays, in England, at any rate, is environed by a vast degree more of etiquette and homage than in days of yore. This is entirely the doing of the late Prince Consort. When he married he was not slow to observe that not only was there a great amount of corruption, extravagance, and maladministration at the court of his royal bride, but likewise that there was, particularly on the part of the great nobles and principal dignitaries, an absence of deference and respect for the occupant of the throne, which grated strongly upon the ideas of a young prince who owed, if not his political principles, at any rate, his views with regard to manner, etiquette and breeding to Austria's great Chancellor, Prince Metternich. A Liberal in politics, and that, too, of the most advanced description, he revived at the English court all those medieval ideas according to which no one was entitled to wait upon the sovereign, or upon the members of the reigning family unless possessed of noble lineage and rank.—Ex-Attache at the Court of St. James.

he was again attacked in the next spring. You can imagine the fear and dread with which we watched these recurring attacks, each one more severe than the last, and each one leaving our boy in a worse condition than those that went before. His last attack confined him to bed for three months, and his heart was dangerously affected. His sufferings were terrible, and it was pitiful to see him trying to carry food to his mouth. His nervous system was so shattered that a form of St. Vitus' dance had affected him and his hand and arm trembled so that he could not feed or aid himself. Some friends advised me to try Dr. Williams' Pink Pills and recommended them so highly that my husband and myself decided to try them. We gave them to Harry for several months and when the spring came watched anxiously, fearing a return of the trouble, but were thankful and delighted to see no symptons of it, nor has he been troubled for the past three years. "What is the condition of his health at present?" asked the reporter. "He is as sturdy and as healthy a boy as parents could wish for. I attribute his recovery and present health to nothing but Pink Pills, and I cheerfully recommend them to all."

Mainly All Dry Food for Chicks.

The past season we fed our little chicks a large amount of common oatmeal, costing us 2 1-2 cents per pound by the barrel. We used this mainly during the first month of their lives. After that we worked in cracked corn and a little later began to feed whole wheat. All infertile eggs tested out of the incubators were boiled twenty to thirty minutes, crumbled up and fed to the chicks. We did not feed as much millet seed this year as previously, and hold to the opinion that this was the reason of our having less trouble with bowel disorders. Millet seed is a strong food. It should be fed sparingly and not as an exclusive diet. Chicks that are over three or four weeks old do not seem to care much for millet seed.

Our chicks are partial to boiled potatoes. They are also very fond of green bone and the boiled blood. We aim at a variety of balanced food stuffs for them, feeding the richer foods cautiously, and changing foods and beginning with new foods gradually. A radical or sudden change in their diet will bring on bowel trouble which is usually fatal in large numbers. Dry grain is a natural food for poultry.—Reliable Poultry Journal.

Ground Oats for Chicks.

An objection to the use of ground oats for chicks is that they contain a large proportion of the chaff, or hulls, which are not beneficial. Ground oats are superior to all ground grains for chicks, and to avoid the difficulty it is only necessary to sift the oats after they are ground, which removes the objectionable portions.

Where the flock is small, consisting of about a dozen fowls, four or five nests are sufficient, and there may be a saving of space by arranging the nests as in the illustration. A box two feet square and one foot deep will provide four nests, as shown by the dotted lines, and the entrances may be arranged in any manner preferred (front and rear). If more nests are required, one or more can be added by placing them on the box, as may be seen in the illustration. By this arrangement the nests can be moved or placed anywhere in the house, or carried outside to be cleaned (as it is not necessary to nail the top to the sides), and being very compact, there is quite a saving of space compared with the usual method of fastening continuous nests to the sides of the house, while by separating the nests from the roosts the nests will be cleaner, and the roosts more easily arranged for the convenience of the fowls. The entrances to two of the nests are not seen, they being at the rear or other side.

The Hen a Capitalist.

It sometimes happens that a flock of poultry, which are allowed free range of the farm suffer more from lack of variety of food than do those which are confined to small yards.

The poultry grower who keeps his fowls in limited quarters, usually knows the necessity of giving not only an occasional change of food, but he knows that the growing and the laying birds must have varied food elements, to build up the frame and to maintain the health, and to supply the material for the egg and its shell. He knows the need of gravel to aid the digestion, of lime to form the egg shell and the bone, and he provides the lime not in dust or limestone, but in wheat and wheat bran, which are rich in lime constituents. He realizes that the hen is a fresh-eating as well as grain-eating bird, and when insects are not abundant he provides meat, either in fresh or dry scraps or fish, and he feeds cora when he desires to lay on the fat, or to enrich the contents of the egg shell.

The farmer who allows an unlimited range for his fowl thinks they find meat enough in the worms and grasshoppers which they do at certain seasons, but he seldom thinks that the meat want must be supplied when the ground is frozen or covered with snow. He sees gravel around the house, and he does not think that, as hens have been kept in the same place for a century or two, the gravel is not as good now as it was when it was first used.

If he does not grow wheat he does not feed it, and if he feeds bran it is because it is cheaper than corn meal.

Then he does not think it necessary to provide dust baths where they can reach them in wet weather as well as dry, and in many other ways the fowl are neglected. They may do better under neglect when given a chance to forage for themselves than they would if shut up in a small yard and there neglected, but careful attention can do better for them to keep the chickens growing thriftily and the hens laying more profitably than they would do if given their liberty.

Therefore, treat the hen as a capitalist, who is able to pay for the best in the land.

Anthrax in Fowls.

Anthrax in fowls is the same as the black leg in calves. The blood is diseased, and settles in the various parts of the body, causing these to become swollen and black. It is exceedingly contagious, and is due to faults in feeding either to excess or insufficiency. It becomes contagious. This disease at-

BABY'S SLEEPY TIME.

Little feet that run to meet me,
Little arms that fondly twine
'Round my neck with loving fervor,
Little red lips coaxing mine—
These I love, but when the shadows
Of the hilltops slowly climb,
There is something I hold dearer—
'Tis my baby's sleepy time.

Softly rocking in the twilight,
Crooning some old cradle song,
Answering the many questions
That to childhood's realm belong.
'Till the lashes, downward creeping,
Touch her cheek with dainty grace,
And I softly press warm kisses,
On the faint-flushed, upturned face.

O my little white-robed darling,
All too soon the years will fly,
You will grow away from mother,
Will not need her lullaby.
Time is pitiless to mothers,
And I know till life's decline,
I shall, when the shadows gather,
Miss my baby's sleepy time!

STORY OF AN "IF."

Two well-dressed men, both still young, though one was a few years the senior of his friend, stood near a steamboat landing on the Sound one summer morning, watching the roustabouts transferring freight from the shore to the deck of the craft on which they were about to take passage.

The elder of the two, who had been continually looking about in an expectant manner, suddenly called out: "Here you are at last, old fellow. What in the world has kept you?"

Then came rushing toward him, skillfully and yet politely, eluding all playful attempts to impede his progress, a little boy infant five years of age, who was a perfect picture of rugged health and childish beauty. His hat, perched carelessly on his head, formed the background for a mass of golden hair, blown hither and thither as his sturdy legs sped down the gravel slope. His round, happy face, glowed in the morning air, and his eyes sparkled with ill-suppressed excitement.

"Oh, papa!" he began, before he had quite recovered his breath. "I have had such a time with Max!"

"I was beginning to fear he had made a breakfast of you," was the father's answer, as the child slipped one little hand in his.

"He might try, if he could get at me now," rejoined the little fellow. "But he's safe enough in one of the staterooms, if some one don't let him out."

But at that moment the steamboat gave a shrill whistle, and Jack, walking between his father and his father's friend, turned to go on board the boat.

Among the passengers assembled on the upper deck stood a little girl of more than ordinary attractiveness. She was stepped out on the hurricane deck, and looking down upon the passengers, his hands in his pockets and determination in his eye, blurted out:

"You may as well understand me now as ever. I am captain of this boat, and I know how to run her. I've no time to stop for dogs, and I won't stop, and you can make the most of it!"

The girl, looking prettier than ever, stood erect as an arrow, her hands clutching the folds of her blue flannel yachting dress, every nerve tingling with indignation. The captain retired amid a chorus of groans and hisses.

All eyes turned again toward the water. Max was evidently becoming exhausted; the pace was telling on him. His red tongue now and again showed clear against the background of his black head as he gulped in the air, and once Jack thought he heard a faint yelp. The father had all he could do to restrain the boy's excitement.

Towle was so angry that he could scarcely speak. He hardly dared look toward Max. He could almost fancy the look of mingled questions and reproach that must be in the dog's eyes. "What does it all mean? Why must I swim so far? I thought you wanted me to come to you. I am doing my best."

"Yes, poor fellow," said Towle, as if in answer to these unspoken queries, "if you were a man now, instead of a dog, that brute of a captain might deign to than ordinary attractiveness. She was just passing that line of life on one side of which people write "girl" and on the other "young lady." She attracted not a little attention as she stood there, leaning lightly over the rail. When Jack and his guardians reached the deck she was saying goodby to a sun-bonneted friend on the landing, and Towle, the younger of the two men, caught the full beauty of the fresh face as she laughed out some pert reply to her friend's earnest caution: "Now, do be careful, Priscilla."

Already the time for casting off the moorings had passed. The captain was vigorously ordering about the deckhands and confusion reigned. The pretty girl stood up on a seat to get clear of a line that was being hauled in, still talking with her friend on shore.

"Pretty as a picture," thought Towle, as he watched the lissome figure swaying with the motion of the boat. Priscilla waved her last adieu, and then her friend, mingling with those left on the landing, turned away.

The young girl still stood on the rail seat; Towle hovered in her immediate vicinity; Jack was watching the receding shore. Presently the child's voice rose in a cry that was almost a scream:

"Look, papa! There comes Max!"

Down the slope toward the water bounded the big Newfoundland. Rushing through the little party that had just left the landing, the dog brought up with a mighty effort on the very edge of the wharf.

Jack, jumping up on the rail seat, waved both hands and shouted: "Good-by, old fellow! Good-by, Max!"

But Max misinterpreted the gesture. Prompt in obedience to the supposed signal, he jumped into the water and struck out in the wake of the boat. It was not under much headway yet, but Max could make but a poor showing in the race. Jack became very nervous. He scarcely knew whether Max was swimming or drowning.

"Can't we stop the boat?" he asked.

"Oh, no," said his father. "Max will get tired in a minute and make for the shore."

Towle leaned over the stern and called to the dog to go back, but Max took it all for encouragement, and swam on steadily. The boat as steadily gained on him. The channel was widening now, and Max evidently had no intention of abandoning the race.

Everyone on the boat presently became much excited, and beginning with sympathy for Little Jack, ended in the deepest anxiety as to the fate of the dog.

Jack was still standing beside the girl, who was making no effort to hide the excitement that was taking possession of her. Jack's father stood just behind with a light hand on the child's shoulder. Towle was not far away.

The boy was trembling in every limb. Oh, Max! Dear Max!" he cried. "You can't catch us!" Then, recalled by his father's touch. "Why, papa. We must stop the boat, so he can catch up."

The girl reached out her hand and took hold of Jack's. She said nothing, but her teeth were pressed tightly against her lower lip, and the big, brown eyes were beginning to fill.

The only apparently uninterested person on the boat was the captain. The awning had not yet been spread over the deck, and he could plainly be seen standing in the pilot house. Towle turned toward him and called out: "I say, captain, can't you slow down; and let my dog come up with us? He won't go back, and I'm afraid he can't hold out much longer."

The captain turned from the wheel for a moment, and glanced lazily toward the dog bravely paddling away for his life.

"Oh, he'll get along well enough. He'll soon give up and go back. I can't stop for a dog."

Murmurs of indignation were heard on every hand. Jack's face bore a look of the most complete surprise at the discovery that the captain could possibly refuse to stop for Max's sake. The sympathetic tears of Priscilla's eyes turned to glittering evidences of deep indignation, as she stamped her foot, and seemed about to speak. But Towle's words came first:

"I don't ask you to stop for the sake of the dog," said he to the captain. "I'll make it well worth your while to slow down a bit."

"Yes, indeed," chimed in a young fellow who had been growing particularly interested in the situation. "Besides," he went on, raising his voice so that the captain could not fail to hear, "it makes no difference except to your passengers if we get in a few minutes late, and if we don't care, why should you?"

"That's what's the matter!" came loudly from the little crowd that was now facing the pilot house. This uprising of the whole ship's company was more than the captain could quietly endure.

Leaving the wheel to his mate, he that brute of a captain might deign to lose a moment or so of his valuable time."

"I'm not so sure of that," remarked the young man, who had participated in the vain effort to persuade the captain. "There's very little of the milk of human kindness in that fellow, I fancy."

"Possibly," said Jack's father; "but the law would bring him to terms in such a case. He'd stop quick enough if there was a man overboard."

Scarcely were the words spoken before they were echoed back from the lower deck.

"Man overboard!" was the cry indeed.

So suddenly it came that it almost seemed like a trick to bring the captain to terms. In the confusion of the moment the reality appeared strangely unreal. Even little Jack was at first scarcely able to understand, when he managed to cry out:

"There she is! Don't let her drown, too!"

No one but Jack had noticed how something his father said seemed to add to the excitement of the pretty girl by his side, and in his terror for the fate of poor Max he hardly realized what she was doing when she put one foot up on the rail and vaulted over the side.

It was all done in an instant; she was in the water before three persons knew that she had disappeared. Towle had his coat off in a twinkling, but a sailor had already jumped from between the decks and was swimming with steady, easy strokes to the aid of the impulsive girl. Others were lowering a boat, and the captain, at last in accord with the passengers, had the engines reversed. Jack's father was astounded at the turn of affairs.

"Did you ever dream of such a foolish act?" he exclaimed. "The child actually took up my words and leaped overboard to save the dog."

So impressed was he with the nobleness of the girl that, had it not been for Jack, he would certainly have been one of the boat's crew. But Towle forestalled him. Yet, after all, the girl did not appear to need much help. When she rose after her plunge in to the water she turned her face otwards the dog and struck out as if she had been a veritable water nymph. The sailor was soon close behind her.

"Don't tire yourself out, miss," he cried. "Lie on your back and float. They'll soon pick us all up now."

But the girl swam on. Her bath had completely dispelled the momentary frenzy of excitement that had impelled her to jump. She felt nothing but chagrin now. She did not want to look anybody in the face, and there was not only the sailor close behind, but a boat load of others were coming. She wished that she dared to go on with the part and dive down to the bottom of the sea.

The sailor's breathing sounded awfully near and the click of the oarlocks told how near the boat was also. Even Max, who now was hardly able to swim a stroke, and who seemed to recognize in all this excitement something which might accrue his benefit, seemed to her to be laughing at her predicament. She was beginning to think she had better drown herself than face all the mortification that seemed to threaten when she suddenly stopped swimming and disappeared.

The sailor reached the spot where the girl had gone down just in time to see her black hair gleaming at the surface again. Placing one arm under her body, he supported it as best he might until the boat came up. Towle was in the bow, terribly frightened to see the girl lying so still in the water.

"Is she dead?" he asked, in a hoarse whisper.

"Oh, no," said some one. "She'll soon come to. There's too much color there for a bad faint."

They lifted her in and laid her carefully in the thwarts, a pea-jacket under her, with Towle's coat for a pillow.

"Don't forget the dog!" said a sailor.

"That's so," said Towle, coming back from the realm of fancy into which he found himself drifting. "Pick up the poor beast, and you shan't lose by it, boys."

And so Max, in full worse plight than the girl herself seemed to be, was hauled in and placed beside her.

Everybody on the steamer crowded to the side to catch a glimpse of the heroine of the hour. The stewardess knelt down beside the drenched figure as soon as it was brought on deck and officially announced that the girl was only in a faint. The crowd was presently induced to stand back, and finally Max, with Jack's arms around his neck, became the temporary center of attraction, while the stewardess had the girl carried down into her cabin.

The burden bearers had scarcely disappeared up the companionway when the girl jumped from the sofa on which they had placed her, and, falling on her knees in front of the startled stewardess, cried out:

"You'll never tell anybody, will you? I didn't faint at all. I just couldn't look

DON'T abandon HOPE —as I Offer you Great Encouragement ! Without egotism, I would say I am prepared to do what no other man in America can do, viz. Hold any reducible Hernia during the hardest work or severest strain—even horseback riding. Where failure has been the result in the United States and the large hospitals in the great cities of Europe, cases given up as hopeless, I alone succeeded. Don't "put off" your case or that of your child ; regret and sorrow may come when least expected, and too late to remedy. Your rupture gives little trouble now, and appears trifling. You neglect it. This is where your danger lies

BE WARNED IN TIME ! Should your rupture be hidden from view by some large clumsy truss you are lulled into a sense of false security. Your Hernia is not held, and you are in a more dangerous condition than you imagine. are less likely to be displaced than straw. They require less labor, too. They cannot be shaken up like straw, and the only implement needed is a rake, by which, until a new supply is needed, those which are clean and dry can be pushed back over those which are soiled, and once or twice a week all can be cleaned out. Now we believe that the only reason why leaves are not more generally and extensively used is the difficulty in storing them. They are so light and bulky that to secure a sufficient stock to last for the winter would require more room than any farmer has to spare. This difficulty can be obviated by pressing them. We heard a livery stable keeper recently advocate the practicability of pressing them for market. It was his belief that bales of dried leaves would find ready sales. It would certainly be an article of commerce on which cost would be reduced to a minimum, and where material is so abundant and opportunity so frequent, it seems as if the suggestion might meet with favor. For persons who only keep a single horse or cow, or who only need a comparitively small amount of bedding, we offer a simple device for storing leaves. Take an open barrel, the larger the better, fit a circular head, and press your leaves yourself. If you are ingenious enough to apply a simple screw, all the easier and quicker will you do the work. If you have no such appliance, then heavy weights will answer the purpose. The leaves will come out in layers convenient for storing and use. Almost any premises will have trees enough to supply the amount required. Your stock will have better litter at very much less trouble to yourself, and you will have in the spring a pile of the very best manure without any seeds of grass or weeds in it. You will have saved three or four dollars which straw would have cost you, and your pile of manure will be quadrupled.

Milkweed.

Many people who have lived in the country all their lives have yet to learn that the milkweeds, cut down as cumberers of the ground, are both beautiful and fragrant—the last especially true nights and mornings. Were these rare plants we should cultivate them as we do cannas and dahlias. The orange-red milkweed is more showy and more beautiful than the zinnia, and its rich color and abundant bloom would be thought very ornamental were it not classed in our minds as a weed. The taller species, with its pinkly purplish umbels, is more delicately colored, yet more imposing in appearance. The flowers of these asclepiads are beautifully constructed to serve the mission of the plant, and deserve to be known as the chices of our waste places. They are fascinating to bees and other insects, often fatally so.

Hear what the late William Hamilton Gibson, who though dead, yet speaks to us, from writings still in publishers' hands, has to say of this "weed":

"The flower is but a bright anticipation—an expression of hope in the being of the parent plant. It has but one mission. All its fragrance, all its nectar, all its beauty of form and hue, are but means toward the consummation of the eternal edict of creation—"increase and multiply." To that end we owe all the infinite forms, designs, tints, decortaions, perfumes, mechanisms and other seemingly inexplicable attributes.

"Next to the floral orchids the mechanism of our milkweed blossom is perhaps the most complex and remarkable and illustrates * * * the absolute divine intendance of a plant species upon the visits of an insect. The milkweed flower is a deeply planted contrivance to insure such an end. It fills the air with enticing fragrance. Its nectaries are stored with sweets, and I fancy each opening bud keenly alert with conscious solicitude for its affinity. Though many other flowers manage imperfectly to perpetuate their kind in the default of insect intervention, the milkweed, like most of the orchids, is helpless and incapable of such resource. Enclose this budded umbel in tarletan guaze and it will bloom days after its fellow blooms have fallen, anticipating this consummation, but no pods will be seen upon this umbel.

"Nature says to the milkweed in plainest terms, 'Your pollen must be removed on the leg of an insect, preferably a bee, or your kind shall perish from the face of the earth.'"

A PERMANENT ARBOR.

How to Build One That Will Easily Last a Lifetime.

The lumber required for the construction of the arbor show in the accompanying sketch consists of posts 4x4 inches and 8 feet long; 2x4-inch scantling 16 feet long, to be cut into 8-foot lengths for top crosspieces, and into lengths of about

Perhaps the "New Woman" will be a stronger woman than the old one. Certainly, fresh air and the right exercise will do much for her. Fresh air is a great restorative, exercise a great nerve tonic if a woman be in condition to take it. A healthy woman can avoid disease. She can avoid the seemingly almost inevitable "weakness" of her sex if she pursues the proper hygienic methods. The same methods will not cure her if she be already sick. Taken under medical direction, in connection with the right medicine, they will help effect a cure. No women who suffers at all from so-called "female weakness" should attempt athletics of any sort. She should first put herself into possession of strong and hearty health by taking Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. After she is thoroughly well, exercise and diversion will help to keep her well. The cure should come first. Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is designed and recommended for only the one thing. It acts directly upon one set of organs. No matter what is the matter with them, it will cure it. It will not cure anything else. It is a wholesome tonic, an invigorating nervine, or nerve-food as well as a healing medicine, and thousands of perfectly well women have found that by taking it regularly during the period of pregnancy, the danger and pain of parturition were much lessened, and in many cases, almost entirely obviated.

In every American household, there should be a copy of Dr. Pierce's great work, "Common Sense Medical Adviser." One copy free to any address on receipt of 21 one cent stamps to pay for customs and mailing only. World's Dispensary Medical Association, Buffalo, N. Y.

Flower Garden Pointers

Foxgloves are best planted away from scarlet flowers as their purplish pink spikes do not harmonize with that color. The pure white foxgloves are effective against a background of dark foliage, when planted in large clumps, having a stately effect. They remain in flower a long time. They can be planted in April and only ask a thinning out if too thick and an occasional stirring of the soil. The dwarf, otherwise known as the California sunflower, is a variety which well deserves a good word and a good place in the garden. Its foliage is clean and of an attractive dark green; its blossoms of a clear bright yellow, the hue of sunshine, and they are very double and about the size of a well grown dahlia. In fact they resemble the old form of that flower to a considerable degree. As a low hedge a row of dwarf sunflowers is literally "a blooming success," and we incline to give it preference over the zinnia for the purpose. It is difficult to think of sunflowers in presence of this compact, clean, bright faced double flower.

Hollyhocks for Waste Places.

A corespondent of The Garden and Forest tells of some hollyhocks planted five or six years ago on land enriched by an old wood pile and since left to themselves. They have increased and multiplied in the rich soil, sending up many seedlings and grouping themselves in beautiful colonies. All shades of bloom are now seen from white through pale flesh tints to deep maroon, varied by buff and lemon tinted flowers. They have crowded out the weeds that disputed territory with them, and now own the soil. Hollyhocks are ideal flowers for such waste places.

A Widower's Tribute.

A pathetic little tribute to a wife's tact and self-forgetfulness was given by an old New Hampshire farmer.

The couple had lived happily together for nearly fifty years, and when the wife died her husband seemed utterly unable at first to act, or even think for himself. The funeral was taken in charge by an energetic niece, and according to those who were present everything was conducted with propriety. One of the neighbors stopped to speak to the poor old widower when the last offices at the grave had been performed.

"William," she said, laying a kindly hand on her old friend's shoulder, "I think everything was beautiful; it was just such a funeral as Mary wished, I am sure."

"You mean well, Mis' Snowden, I know," said the old man, looking up at her with dim eyes, "but you don't take anybody in the face and I didn't. I believe I should have died if they had suspected that I was shamming." And the poor girl burst into tears.

Meanwhile the boat passed through Hell Gate and presently neared the pier. The stewardess kept the girl below until all the other passengers had disembarked. Towle waited in vain for her reappearance. In answer to his inquiry he was told that the "young lady had quite recovered, but must not be disturbed." Nobody found out who she was. Whether Towle was more fortunate subsequently pertains not to this story.

Even Jack and Max had to go ashore without so much as saying good-by to Priscilla; but one of the deckhands, an old salt and a dry one, watched her out of the corner of his eye when she finally came on deck and hurried along down the plank. This was his comment:

"That was the pluckiest thing I ever knew a gal to do; and the foolishest."

The Mistake on the Mustache.

"Forgive me."

It was the barber who spoke.

"Why, you didn't jab that brush in my mouth once," said the young man.

"No, but—"

"You didn't cut off my ear at all."

"That is true, sir; however—"

"You didn't stick your finger in my eye, not once to-day."

"I know that; nevertheless—"

"And you haven't told a story since I've been in the room."

"Just the same—"

"Well, what have you done?"

"I grieve to say so," murmured the barber, with the true Oriental politeness of a tonsorialist, "but I have accidentally shaved off half your mustache."

"Suffering smoke!" gasped the youth. "And this is the fourth time I've tried to raise one." He was deeply moved, but controlled himself by a mighty effort. Anon his old composure returned.

"Well, that's gone up," he muttered philosophically.

"Excuse me again," ventured the polite barber, who was a stickler for propriety, "but wouldn't it be more correct to say that it is gone down?"

Then the youth rose up and slew him.

Why He Was Welcome.

"Here, Harry, is a dime for you," said Mr. Harker to the little brother of the one he loves. "Have you ever heard Miss Bessie say anything about me when I wasn't here?"

"Oh, lots of times," replied the sweet child.

"And what does she say, Harry?"

"She says she's always glad to have you come here when she's feelin' all wore out and tired."

"And," continued the delighted young man, "does she ever explain why she likes to have me come at such times?"

"Yes. She says you're so easy she can go to sleep and still keep you guessin'."—Cleveland Leader.

GARDEN AND ORCHARD

A REMARKABLE PEAR TREE.

Illustrations Showing What May Be Done by Careful Training.

One of the most remarkable of old trained pear trees that we are acquainted with is the splendid specimen of Uvedale's St. Germain at Weston House, Shipston-on-Stour, the residence of the Countess of Camperdown. The accompanying illustrations are reproduced from photographs taken by Mr. S. Freeman of Moreton-in-Marsh, and published in The Gardeners' Magazine. Mr. Masterson, the gardener at Weston House, writes that "the tree is admired at all times of the year, but more especially when covered with large handsome clusters of flowers. In autumn, when laden with quantities of big fruits, it also presents an attractive appearence, and there are many who also admire the tree when the stems are bare, and certainly at this season it is interesting, as the training is very remarkable. The tree seldom fails to ripen a heavy crop of fruits cropping right down to the ground. It has never been fed or root pruned, and its roots are in the bed of the carriage drive, gravel also encircling the stem at the base, where it measures six feet in circumference. It is, however, very probable that the roots have penetrated a considerable distance and come into contact with the stable drains, thus deriving the nourishment required by so large a tree. The fruits are seldom thinned, as the tree is so vigorous as to be capable of carrying very large crops, and yet the fruits weigh from half a pound to one and a half pounds each. The total weight of the crop last year was two hundredweight. Many first prizes have been won from this tree, including firsts at the Crystal Palace in 1894 and 1895."

Leaves as Manure.

Right in my closest vicinity is an avenue of large maples, elms and other trees, which shed great quantities of leaves every fall, so that it is not a difficult task to gather dry leaves by the wagon load. Such dead leaves, says T. Grenier, in The Practical Farmer, are not only good bedding, but they are the warmest litter that can be put under an receiving, to be cut into 8-foot lengths for top crosspieces, and into lengths of about 4 feet for the braces at the upper corners, and stripes 1x2 1-2 inches, also 16 feet long. All the lumber used should be dressed, for the structure, to be durable, must be painted, and undressed lumber requires more than double the amount of paint and twice the labor to apply it.

Make a mortise in each post with the lower edge about one foot from the end, of such dimensions as to receive the scantling snugly. Dress this end of each post by sawing off the corners, as shown in the illustration. This will leave about eight inches to extend above the arbor. About 20 inches below the lower edge of the first mortise and on the opposite side, make a second mortise, running diagonally across the post at an angle of 45 degrees and of such width and depth as to receive the scantling snugly and flush with the post. This diagonal mortise must be cut in the opposite direction in half of the posts, as will be seen by observing the position of the braces. Into the lower end of each post bore a hole five inches deep of proper diameter to receive a piece of three-quarters-inch gas pipe so that it fits tightly when hammered in. The piece of pipe should be about a foot long, thus leaving about 7 inches to extend from the post.

Now procure tiling or sewer pipe of two-foot lengths and three inches in interior diameter. Set these eight feet apart each way, measuring from the center of the tiles in the direction of the arbor, and from there outer edge across the arbor, if structure is to be eight feet wide, as it should be. Place them in perfect line, with their top about four inches above ground, and tramp in the earth firmly about them. Then saw the scantling into eight-foot lengths for the top crosspieces, and make the braces, cutting these at an angle of 45 degrees. Lay two of the posts parallel on level ground and nail the top crosspieces in place, keeping all parts square. Then fasten a temporary strip across the lower ends of the posts and nail the upper corner braces in place.

When all the posts have thus been fastened together in pairs, mix up thoroughly one part of Portland cement with two and one-half parts of good sharp sand and moisten with just sufficient water to make a stiff mortar, avoiding an excess of water. Having filled two of the opposite tiles with the cement, erect one of the sections and allow the irons at the base of the post to settle into the cement until the posts rest upon the tiles. Get the section plumb and brace firmly in that position. This is important, for the cement will begin to set almost immediately and it is well to have as little motion of the irons as possible after they are once in the tiles. The first section can be easily braced to posts or stakes driven in the ground and the others, which are to be erected in a like manner, can then be braced to this. It is well not to moisten more than enough of the mixed cement at one time than will fill two of the tiles, as it sets so readily. When all the sections are up, nail on the narrow strips which are to support the vines. Finally, apply three good coats of paint, and you will have an arbor that will never rot off at the base and one which the wind can never overturn so long as it leaves anything else standing.—American Agriculturist.

He Raised the Wind.

The ship had lain becalmed in a tropical sea for three days. Not a breath of air stirred the mirror like surface of the sea or the limp sails that hung from the yards like drapery carved in stone.

The captain resolved to wait no longer. He piped up all hands on deck, and requested the passengers to also come forward.

"I must ask all of you," he said, "to give me every match you have."

Wonderingly the passengers and crew obeyed.

The captain carefully arranged the matches in his hands as each man handed him his store, until all had been collected. Then he threw them all overboard but one, drew a cigar from his pocket, and, striking the solitary match on the mainmast, endeavored to light it.

In an instant a furious gale swept over the deck, extinguished the match and filled the sails, and the good ship Mary Ann sped through the waves on her course.—Philadelphia Inquirer.

The Old Man.

There is a member of the club who is young in years, but is already the active managing head of a large retail and wholesale hardware establishment. He was relating an experience the other day: "I was standing near two clerks, who did not see me. The younger asked the other—who was ten years older than himself—in regard to a special discount. Said he in answer, 'I don't know. Ask the old man.'

"I wondered whom he could mean, the clerk seemed to know, for he pat straight to the office and asked for me.

"Was I offended? Not much. It was the proudest moment of my life. No man is ever 'the old man' about a store unless he is respected and liked. It means power, appreciation, respect. When a man of my age earns that title he ought to feel happy enough to go out and throw roses at himself."—Hardware.

prisoner: "Witness, I want to ask you one question. Did the detectives accost you in the Paisley House dining room, and in the presence of waitresses and guests say to you. 'Are you the man?' This is a story I have heard, and I want to know if it is true."

The prisoner replied that there was not a word of truth in it, and the magistrate remarked that he was much pleased to hear that such was the case.

"Well, it never happened, Your Worship," said the witness.

Mr. Porter remarked, loud enough to be heard. "They can't make that man tell a lie, even if it is something greatly in his own favor."

The accused made a much better witness to-day and his testimony left very little to be desired.

AFTER ADJOURNMENT.

R. S. Shipman has resided in Napanee for nearly 43 years, and kept a daily record of the weather. Turning up the record he found there had been clear weather on Aug. 27th, Aug. 28th the same, on the 29th a heavy thunderstorm arose about 9 o'clock in the evening and the rain fell heavily for a few hours. It rained again on the 1st day of September, a light rain. On the 11th of Sept there was heavy rainfall lasting most of the forenoon. Mr. Shipman has kept this record for about 8 years.

W. T. Waller testified he was a hardware merchant and had some experience in making Yale lock keys and it is a very difficult thing to do. The paper with the key impressions being produced Mr. Waller said they were the impressions of a Yale key and it would be impossible to make a key from that impression that would fit the lock. The imprint on the paper couldn't be transferred to wax. A key had not been made from the impression submitted as it would exhibit the marks of the fitting if it had been. A pattern could not be taken of the impressions except by cutting the key impressions out. The Grange block is covered with a galvanized iron roof and tar and gravel. The roof extends over THE EXPRESS OFFICE and Coxall's store. These roofs expand with the heat of the sun and contract at night and produce a rattling noise. Sounds are emitted from conductor pipes and if the wind is blowing it emits a moaning noise.

To Mr. Madden—

These cracking noises couldn't be mistaken for footsteps. The roof over Ponton's rooms on the Grange block is of gravel. The weather wouldn't affect such a roof. A portion of the roof covering THE EXPRESS office and Coxall's is of galvanized iron and a part covered with gravel.

Wm. Smith, jeweller, sworn said that he had experience in locks and keys. He was the gentleman who had been called in when the vault went wrong after the robbery. Knew the Yale lock and the kind of key used in operating them. Piece of paper containing impressions of Yale lock keys produced. A key could not be made from the impressions, and a key had not been made from them. The impressions could not be tranfferred to wax or any other substance from the paper. The only way by which a key could be made from these impressions would be by cutting it out. It is difficult to make a duplicate key with the original key as a pattern. It would be a toss up whether a key made from the old key would fit without having the lock to try it in while making it.

To Mr. Madden—

Would not swear a key can't be made from impressions submitted but was positive a key nad not been made from the impressions.

E. McLaughlin, stationer in the Grange block, knew the locality of Mr. Ponton's rooms. They were almost directly above his place of business. I occupied the store on the night of the bank robbery. I know Mrs. Hannah McGreer. I had a conversation with Mrs. McGreer after the robbery, which occurred on Friday night. She called upon me on the Monday morning following I think, but it might have been a week later, and enquired if I had been in my office the night before that as she had heard noises as if some one had been there. I told her there had been nobody in my shop and she said possibly it might have been in the next shop. She spoke as if she could not locate where the noise was but thought it was below somewhere. I was satisfied there was no noise around my place. I enquired in the shop next door and ascertained that they heard no noises and hadn't been in the shop at that time.

To Mr. Madden—

It was about 8 o'clock in the morning I

The figures 16 would be made first to show the amount of cash in his own compartment of the safe. If 15 meant tens or fives it would mean the amount of that denomination in the teller's compartment of the safe, speaking from the Merchant's Bank procedure.

T. G. Carscallen, undertaker, recollected that on the 27th of July he was called to the Paisley House to lay out a man named Merrill, who had died suddenly. On the morning of the 28th, about one o'clock, he started for home and when passing the Dominion Bank he noticed a light in the building and perceived a man in the Dominion Bank; behind the desk and in front of the vault. Could not see him distinctly as the lower part of his body was screened by the frosting on the window. Could not see only his head and shoulders. It was a very dark night and raining. William Masters was with me. It was remarked that they were keeping late hours in the bank as well as we were. I reported this occurrence after the robbery and as a result was visited by Detective Wilkes, and was interviewed in Detective Dougherty's rooms. I told Dougherty what I have related here and we proceeded over to the bank but could not get in and we went back to his rooms. Dougherty then took my statement down in writing. He asked me first if I knew the man or how he was dressed. I replied I didn't know who he was or how he was dressed He asked me if he had a cap on and I said I didn't know. He then asked me if he had a golf cap on and I replied I didn't know what a golf cap was. Dougherty produced a golf cap and putting it on his head asked was it one like that. My answer was I didn't know.

Did you tell Detective Dougherty that the man you saw in the bank had a golf cap on?

I did not.

If he swore you did, would it be true?

It would not.

Dougherty said he had been told by some parties it would be impossible to see a man in the bank as you say. He suggested going out and experimenting how it was. We gained access to the bank and I said the window is not the same as the night I saw the man. Mr. Dougherty lowered the blind from above, and placed it as it was on the night in question. We then went across to the Paisley House and walked back towards the bank, I told him there was something wrong yet and Dougherty went in and found there was paste board over the sand glass, which he removed. We then placed a man in the same place, returned to the Paisley House, walked back and I could see the man. Dougherty said I'm satisfied you could see the man all right but I'm not surprised at your not knowing him or knowing how he was dressed. He thanked me for coming up and seeing him and said good night and left. Dougherty did not stand in front of the vault door himself and ask me if I could see him. I did not tell him he was standing in front of the vault that I could see about as much of the man as I see of him.

To Mr. Madden.

Messrs. Bogart Wilkes and Dougherty, made a fair test and didn't suggest anything.

Wilkes and Bogart were with us. Mr. Dougherty wished to fairly investigate my statement that I had seen the man, and having done so, they ought to be able to say as much about exchanging the man in front of the safe.

"But he didn't tell me that he changed the man."

"Now don't be so clear about that."

"Dougherty was with me, and Bogart and Wilkes were inside. On one occasion I think I saw Dougherty standing in front of the vault, at least, I think it was him. He had gone in to clear the papers obstructing the light from the inside window. When I went to Dougherty's room I said nothing about the hat. I am sure I never said it was a golf cap.

Alex Karr recollected the night of the burglary of the Dominion Bank as he had occasion to go to train from the west at 10 o'clock and returned immediately after the train came in. Came back up John St., turned east at Dr. Bissonnette's corner opposite Post Office, my sister-in-law who I had gone to meet was with me. When the evidence as binding on the case. Any number of negative propositions will not prove an affirmative. Supposing Mrs. McGreer's evidence was allowed to go unexplained—admitting that she heard noises in Ponton's rooms, were the footsteps traced to the bank or even out on the roof. There was no evidence to lead the footsteps or your worship's mind that way. Granting to the Crown the strongest possible positition, allowing the evidence of Mrs. McGreer to go uncontradicted, did her story amount to a reasonable presumption that Mr. Ponton had committed the offence. Mrs. McGreer's evidence does not prove a presumption.

It has been explained to the court here to-day how the construction of the roof might explain the noises heard by Mrs. McGreer. Mr. Waller has told to the court how a roof, such as the one on the Grange block makes a cracking sound which would continue until the roof had cooled off. Is it not just possible that was the way the noises were made. Then there is Mr. McLaughlin's evidence that within a day or so after the robbery Mrs. McGreer came to see him in reference to noises she had heard. The evidence is important in this particular that on this occasion at least Mrs. McGreer was unable to locate the noises. Then again the noises heard by Mrs. McGreer were loud enough to disturb a person sleeping in the third storey. They were not made carefully. Would men engaged in a burglary of such magnitude go about their work in such a manner. Burglaries were done in a stealthy way. Would not these noises be heard upon the street. The lady must be mistaken. By what influence or in what manner he could not say. Her evidence should not be relied upon to such an extent as to blast the life of this young man by committing him to trial. Then there is the evidence of the detectives who had verified Ponton's statements as to his movements on that night that he had not been in his rooms up to 12 o'clock. What about the noises heard by Mrs. McGreer at 11 o'clock? It couldn't possibly be Ponton who was making those noises.

Turning to the next branch of the case—the finding of the paper containing the specification of the cash in the bank on the night previous to the robbery—the court should not attach any importance to that paper in view of the evidence. His client swore it was not placed in Mrs. McGreer's room by him. Unless you believe the story that it flew in the window so providently, you must be forced to the conclusion that it was placed there by somebody. After all the matter of the slip was only a matter of theory or conjecture, we want proof. The court was helped to a consideration of this branch of the case by the evidence of Mr. Shipman and his fortunate weather record. The Crown's theory that it was dropped on the roof by his client on the night of the burglary is hardly tenable. If the paper had lain there exposed to the heavy rainstorm of Sunday night the marks upon it would have been entirely obliterated. This was necessary to the theory of the crown, but it never laid there from the Friday night until it was found. If Ponton dropped it on the roof Friday night, with the rain of Sunday night it would have been destroyed and the pencil marks obliterated Had that fragile piece of paper gone through a heavy rainstorm It was asking the court to believe too much. This piece of paper only contained a specification of the cash in the bank on the night of the 26th. It was utterly useless to anyone except the teller. It did not attempt to show the figures of the cash in the bank on the night of the robbery. What earthly purpose would a burglar who had entered into a conspiracy with a clerk in the bank wish to obtain such a paper for? The young men who went into the witness box had sworn that the paper was not gotten out for any ulterior purpose. They had demonstrated that his client had told the truth about the piece of paper Messrs Wallace and Molson, who occupied positions of trust in the Merchant's Bank had told the court they were in the habit of making out just such pieces of paper. There was nothing in the piece of paper.

And now, turning to the last branch of the case, the finding of the key impressions he would ask the court what is it introduced for? It was put in to prove that Ponton had the key of the lower compartment of the safe, but of what possible service would these imprints of the key be to the accused? The evidence showed that the lower compartment of the safe had been forced, and then look at the evidence in connection with the impressions. Witnesses Young, Smith and Waller had sworn that a key never was made from those impressions, and never could be made from them, and Ponton, the accused, swears that he never saw the impressions.

had the conversation with Mrs. McGreer, and it was certainly after the robbery, and it might have been a week after. It was not the day after the robbery, or the following Sunday and may have been on Monday or possibly after.

E. A. Molson, teller in the Merchants Bank here, said he kept his cash in the drawer of his compartments and some of it in the safe. The slip of paper found by Mrs. Bogart, was produced. I would call it a teller's specification sheet showing amount of cash at the end of the day. I see the figures 79, 11, 45, and 4 and what looks like 16 in the front of the 74, and 1 in front of the 45. I have made slips like this out every day, perhaps several times a day. The figures indicate the amount of cash in the safe and the amount in the till. The two combined would make out the total amount of cash on hand and would be transferred into the specification book. I have never seen the cash entered in the specification book without the use of these little slips. It is a good way of keeping account as you can use a lead pencil, and in entering figures in the specification book you are obliged to use a pen. I make use of the back of the slip for putting down the amount of sundry bills that are sent out. I have used the back of the slip to strike my balance. When I am through with slips I generally throw them in the waste paper basket. I don't see anything suspicious in that piece of paper. There is nothing about it that I would not expect to find a teller using.

To Mr. Madden—

Know nothing of the proceedings of the Dominion Bank and have been teller at the Merchants Bank since last spring.

You made more of an explanation about this slip than Mr. Ponton. How do you explain this?

It is my usual custom.

Have you any of those slips now?

Well I don't know. They may be all destroyed as I have not been keeping the cash for the last week.

I wish you could find one of those slips. It might become a very important element in this case.

I will endeavor to do so. The 79 I would think was put down first and the figures 45 next. The figures 16 I would think would indicate there was 1600 one dollar bills. Had heard of a case in Montreal about two years ago when a teller had taken one of those slips out of the bank with him for the purpose of balancing his cash. This slip would not indicate the amount of cash in the treasury but in the till. It would not necessarily represent all the money in the teller's compartment. A slip like that would not represent the torn bills, foreign bills or receips.

J. B. Wallace, a bank clerk and relieving teller. I have been engaged in banking ten years and have filled the position of teller four years in the Merchants Bank of Canada. Am now in the Montreal Branch.

Slip produced. I see the figures 79, 11, 45, 4, 16 and 1. The paper looks very much like a teller's board rule used for a specification of the cash. A teller keeps out the cash he thinks he requires for the day and the balance is left in the compartment of the safe. The figures would indicate the number of fives, tens etc., I had in my cage. The figures 16 and 1 would indicate that it was a memorandum of the cash inside the safe. The combined figures 1679 and 145 would indicate the amount of cash in the cage as well as what you have in the safe. I always use slips of this kind. It is considered a very good way. It saves time and is very convenient. I notice figures on the back of the slip. I often use the back of the slip when I am striking a balance, as we call it. The slip of paper is usually thrown into the waste basket at the close of the day. It is simply a memorandum. I have known those slips to have been carried out of the bank on more than one occasion. I have carried them out myself. If you are out in your cash you might put it in your pocket and after leaving the bank it might occur to you where that difference was. I have never seen the figures entered in the cash book without making out a slip. The slip would contain a memorandum of all the teller's bills. If that paper was handed to me I would not know how much money was in the bank. Know of no ulterior purpose for which the slip could have been used.

reaching East St. just under the trees opposite Mr. Thompson's house I saw a tall man wearing a light colored overcoat with the collar turned up. He came from beneath the trees on the south side of the street. When Dr. Grant now lives and was going west towards the Dominion Bank. He was followed by another man, who was dressed similarly, the second man was probably 8 or 10 feet behind the first and he came from under the trees too. They turned down East St. towards Dundas St. in a direction parallel to which the Dominion Bank stands. The circumstances dropped entirely out of my memory but sometime after detective Wilkes came to me and refreshed my memory. I remarked to my sister in law at the time that it was very peculiar the manner in which these men were dressed. I didn't recognize them as Napanee men. The manner of going along the street was peculiar. The first man was about 6 foot and the other about my own height. They appeared to avoid investigation.

Mr. Karr proved the star witness of the trial

At the request of the Magistrate, E. H. Baines the manager of the branch bank here, was called. He said there was no necessity for his communicating the combination of the safe to anyone excepting the ledger keeper, as they were never both out at the same time.

Mr. Porter said that this was the case and at 6.30 he commenced his address, speaking for almost two hours.

COUNSEL FOR THE DEFENCE.

Mr. Porter said he had no doubt his worship was glad in common with the rest that they were approaching the end of the case. Before touching on the evidence he wished to call the attention of the court to what the law is and how it is to be acted upon in a case of this kind. He directed his Worship's attention to the sections governing the discharge of the prisoner, his committment or a case of committal where bail would be allowed. He wished his worship to keep these sections in view in considering the case.

1st, When the evidence adduced only created a suspicion against the accused, then the Magistrate was justified in discharging him.

2nd, When the evidence was sufficient to warrant his committment for trial.

3rd, When the evidence was such as created a strong presumption of guilt, but not sufficient to warrant a commitment then the Magistrate could hold the prisoner to bail to answer the charge.

He was not aware of the opinion of his worship's mind, but he would strongly press for a discharge of his client. He held there was no sufficient evidence to warrant a commitment or to hold him for trial. A great responsibility rested upon the court, the counsel and all concerned. The magistrate had a duty to perform and he had every confidence he would find upon the evidence according to British justice no matter who it might hurt or benefit. The case narrowed down in his mind to four points, which might be termed the four salient features of the case. A great deal of the evidence had no bearing upon the prisoners guilt or innocence. It should not be overlooked by his worship that all the witnesses who testified on behalf of the Crown, said, that with the single exception of his finances, they found him true and reliable. This fact alone should weigh heavily in his client's favor in considering the case.

The four points of the case may be set down as follows:

1st, The noises heard in Mr. Ponton's rooms by Mrs. McGreer on the night of the robbery.

2nd, The piece of paper found by Mrs. Bogart.

3rd, The financial position of Mr. Ponton.

4th, and lastly. The impressions of the key found in the accused's room.

In considering Mrs. McGreer's story about the noises heard in Mr. Ponton's rooms on the night of the burglary we must look at the strong probability of her being mistaken. In considering the evidence adduced all the circumstances must be considered separately. If the circumstance is such that it does not amount separately to a reasonable suspicion against the accused then it must be set aside. He was not supposed to lump swears that he never saw the impressions, until they were brought into court. There was another side to this evidence and most interesting side, too. Take the evidence of the detectives regarding another piece of paper—the calendar found by Manager Baines containing the figures of the combination of the safe and the evidence of the superintendent of the detectives—and draw conclusions as to where these figures came from. We find that detectives Hodgins, Greer and Wilkes are all clever men in their profession. They arrive after the robbery and for two weeks do all they possibly can to arrive at a solution of the case. Then detective Dougherty appears on the scene and holds a consultation with the other detectives and finds Greer "on the fence" and Wilkes inclined to an inside origination. Dougherty concludes that the robbery was committed by a man with a knowledge of the combination. He tells you that everything failed before the figures of the combination were found and the impressions on the paper were found.

Is this not significant? The other detectives had not been in Baines' room until Dougherty arrives. Baines did not remember having written down the combination. It was necessary to Dougherty's theory that the combination had been given away. Look at the ingenious way in which the figures were found. There was a calendar hanging in Mr. Baines' room, put there in January, 1897. The combination of the safe was changed in May 1896. He carried the combination in his mind until January, when the figures were put down to refreshen his memory. How is the calendar brought to Mr. Baines' attention? Detective Dougherty tells you there was some talk about the moon's phases and then the calendar was referred to.

At this juncture Detective Dougherty rose up and said; "Your Worship, it's not so."

On the last page of the calendar the moon's phases were found and directly above it the figures of the combination of the safe were found. Mr. Baines could not look at the moon's phases without finding the figures. If Mr. Baines had put the figures there, would he forget in August that he had done so? Mr. Baines says the figures are his, but the most natural assumption is that he did not write them. As to who did. I am not concerned. Now, to refer back to the impressions of the key found in Ponton's rooms. There was something else necessary besides the finding of the figures. Hodgins and Greer had visited Ponton's rooms and found nothing of a suspicious nature. The two detectives were in Ponton's rooms with the accused on the night of Sept. 23, and nothing was found. But Mr. Ponton that night went into Ponton's rooms on the 24th the blinds were pulled down so that no one would see them from the street. Dougherty goes to one end of the room and Wilkes to the other; their backs were turned towards one another, and there, in the presence of no one but his Maker, Wilkes says he found this paper. My client says this paper is false.

The crowd applauded the counsel's reflections on the detectives and the Chief informed the audience if there was a repetition of the like he would clear the court room,

Mr. Porter asked if in this third branch of the case there was one tittle of evidence against the accused. They had the evidence of one detective contradicting the other as to the manner in which the impressions were found. Then following out their theory that it was the impression of the key of the lower compartment they went direct to Mr. Baines and asked for the very identical key that fitted the impressions. It was not cleverly done. The finding of the impression was the very thing that caused the arrest of Mr. Ponton. With those circumstances can you place any reliance upon the evidence in regard to the finding of the impressions.

Lastly,—Mr. Ponton's finances I submit this proposition to your worship Is it possible to answer questions relative to your finances from memory? Can you tell how much money you have in your pocket at this moment? Was it possible for him to answer questions of that character without refreshing his memory. The detectives tried to confuse the young man if possible. They told him they were his friends and he could fix it up if he wished or correct his story. But that would only be another step in the play. The boy was sitting there under the inquisitions, day after day. And look at the trival evidence adduced? Because the boy forgot that he had sent his mother $10 they concluded he had robbed the bank.

They were endeavoring to make him change his stories so they could have an accumulation of evidence against him. He was treatad to those inquisitions because there was a little inconsistency in his accounts Take it for granted that Ponton committed the burglary and he was attacked by the detectives. Any mind clear enough to have perpetrated a burglary of that kind would have kept his finances free from suspicion. He would have fixed up his accounts and been all prepared. Take the reverse case. Had Ponton told the same identical story as he told to this court they would have said it was made up.

Mr. Porter dealt with this branch of the case for some time showing that Mr. Ponton could have paid all his debts and still have had $60. He had a way of saving the $60. Did he spend it? He left Toronto with $80 and with this idea uppermost in his mind—he was going to try and get along on his salary and not touch the $80. If he could pay for his bicycle in instalments and his accounts out of his salary he would still have the $80 and time itself would wipe out the debt.

It was simply a case of suspicion. There was no direct evidence, nothing amounting to even circumstantial evidence to connect him with the robbery.

Could the burglary have been perpetrated in any other way? There was the fact that a band of marauders were camped on the banks of the Napanee river during the summer. They were of a class or character of men who could have robbed the bank. They were apt to do it. They were not hanging around for any good purpose. Then there was the evidence of Mr. Young of a former attempt upon the safe. Mr. Carscallen saw a man in the bank on the night of July 27th. Then there was the evidence of Mr. Karr that on the very night of the robbery he saw two suspicious characters in the vicinity of the bank. Ponton could not have been in the bank on July 27th. What Messrs. Karr and Carscallen had seen was a strong circumstance and worthy of investigation. He did not propose to urge the case further. He did desire before closing the importance to his client of the way the case is disposed of. It meant that he would be branded to the extent of a committment for trial or go out a free man. The magistrate had a great responsibility and he would discharge it in the interests of justice. Mr. Porter urged that Mr. Ponton be discharged.

H. M. Deroche, Q. C., in opening his address for the prosecution said he did not propose to take up the time of the court to such a length as his learned friend had in explaining away what he was pleased to term "nothing." Mr. Deroche said that such unseemly exhibitions as had taken place in this court room during the progress of the trial do little credit to the schools and churches of Napanee. He had without fear, favor or affection and unintimidated by public sentiment. It was usual to show respect for the administrators of justice, but the cases was reversed here and the officers who were here engaged in solving the mystery and unravelling the skein of the bank robbery were singled out for abuse. It is an old saying when a lawyer has no defence he abuses the crown witnesses and Mr. Porter had indulged in this to the fullest extent. He had enough faith in Canadians to feel that although the detectives engaged upon the case belonged to another nationality that justice would be done to them. These men have no interest to find Mr. Ponton guilty, and if the evidence pointed to Mr. Ponton as the man the detectives are not to blame. They follow what they find.

Mr. Deroche here made a masterly resume of the case.

Mr. Deroche said his learned friend has tried to make out that the prisoner has been singled out. All the employees of the bank were treated alike. There was no conspiracy against Mr. Ponton. What interest has the Dominion Bank to prove this young man guilty if he is innocent. If the chain of events had not pointed more conclusively to Mr. Ponton as the guilty party he would never have been arrested. With the man's popularity or position the court has nothing to do. If the evidence is against him it is the duty of the court to commit him for trial no matter if he be the son of the Queen of England or a peer of the realm.

He proposed to deal with the argument of the counsel for the defence. There were four salient points, referred to by his learned friend. He would first touch on the evidence of Mr. Waller, and his worship has no right to consider such evidence. The court could only receive evidence of an explanatory nature but not of a contradictory. It had been shown that the roof was not of the character referred to by Mr. Waller. There was no doubt that Mrs. McGreer heard these noises, and it was footsteps she heard. It should be pointed out that in tracing Mr Ponton's movements up to the hour of 12 o'clock on the night of the robbery only the approximate time was verified by the detectives. Then, the slip of paper which my learned friend declared was a nullity, received a great deal of attention, The manager of the bank and the inspector of the bank, two old and experienced men had pledged their oath that the slip was not for any legitimate and lawful purpose and that they had never seen them used. The evidence of the two young men, who were speaking from the Merchant's Bank procedure only, was not to be taken against theirs. Then there was the impressions of the keys. Counsel for the defence said the paper was put there by Detective Wilkes. He seeks to accuse another man of a crime in defence of his own client, who had no interest in the case and was not upon his trial. It was strong presumption on the part of Mr. Porter to impute such a crime to men whose characters were every bit as good as his own. These men were not trying to make evidence, they did not work for a reward. Was it likely that these men, who were employed by the greatest detective agency in the world would be guilty of such an offence. The counsel for the defence might be better engaged than in imputing crime to these men. It was said that it was necessary to Detective Dougherty's theory that the combination had been written down. It was not. Durand may have communicated it to the accused. Mr. Porter was not satisfied with this. He sought to make out that the manager of the bank had committed perjury and that Detective Dougherty had forged the figures on the calendar. There had been nothing in Mr. Dougherty's evidence about the moon's phases and when Mr. Porter said, there was, it was not so.

Turning to the question of finances, Mr, Deroche dealt with it at some length.

Porter had referred to the probability of the prisoner leaving that slip of paper containing the key impressions in his room if he committed the burglary. It was just such little slips as this that lead to the detection of crime. If all criminals guarded well their tracks, crime would go unpunished.

Mr. Deroche asked was the prisoner's story about the $80 he had saved very probable. It had been proved that he borrowed $25 from Mr. Guilett when he was leaving Toronto. He was forced to borrow money from the bank and repudiate how claims to have had. Mr. Porter had referred to the responsibility of committing the young man for trial and how he would be branded for life if the magistrate took that course. The magistrate would be doing full justice to Mr. Ponton if he committed him for trial. He would then go before a judge and have an opportunity of proving his innocence. If he were then acquitted it could not be said that owing to public sentiment he had secured a snap verdict. Mr. Deroche declared that all the evidence pointed to Mr. Ponton's guilt and the magistrate had no other course but to commit him.

Mr. Daly then retired and held a consutation with S. C. Warner, County Crown Attorney. On his return Magistrate Daly summed up the case in a few well chosen words. His worship was convinced that sufficient evidence had not been adduced against the accused to warrant a conviction and he would take the responsibility of discharging him. His worship's words were greeted with cheers. Mr. Ponton was then discharged.

Over 3000 people are destitute as a result of the fires, and the loss to property is estimated at nearly half a million. The distress is very great, and in view of the near approach of winter the need of help is urgent. Clothing and bedding will be acceptable, but money is what is most needed. The committee acknowledged receipt of the following donations: Harvey Warrer $5, Jehiel Aylsworth one chest of tea, Dr. Cowan two barrels of potatoes.

John Wilson, the eccentric individual who was arrested at Cobourg and brought to Napanee for stealing money and cigars from Williams' restaurant Napanee, received his trial on Tuesday. After hearing the evidence Magistrate Daly sentenced John to six months in Central Prison, Toronto. When Wilson arrived here from Coubourg he had neither a coat to his back nor boots on his feet. Turnkey John Wiggins, of the Cobourg jail, who with Chief J. C. Ruse was here to attend the trial, says that Wilson had much less clothes than that on when he arrived at the jail. Wilson gave a letter to Turnkey Wiggins wherein he admitted having stole the articles. He abused the officers roundly and appears to have a screw loose somewhere.

A Collingwood Resident Tells How South American Nervine Cured His Daughter of Distressing Nervous Disease.

The father of Jessie Merchant of Collingwood tells this story of his eleven-year-old daughter: "I doctored with the most skilled physicians in Collingwood without any relief coming to my daughter, spending nearly five hundred dollars in this way. A friend influenced me to try South American Nervine, though I took it with little hope of it being any good. When she began its use she was hardly able to move about, and suffered terribly from nervous spasms, but after taking a few bottles she can now run around as other children." For stomach troubles and nervousness there is nothing so good as South American Nervine. Sold by A. W. Grange & Bro.

Mrs. Eliakim Huff passed away at her residence in Napanee on Tuesday, aged 73 years and 8 months. Deceased was highly esteemed and respected for her many excellent qualities. The funeral took place on Thursday to the Napanee Cemetery and was largely attended.

A Kingston servant girl ransacked her mistress's house while the latter was in church and stole everything of value around the premises. Her trunk was searched and the missing articles found. The girl was a church worker and a member of the Epworth League. Her offence was committed to keep up appearances. She was to be married shortly, and wanted to show her husband's family that she was equally as well off as him.

Everybody knows it would be the height of absurdity to hold up a newspaper man and when we learned that W. J. Taylor, of The Tweed News, had been held up in that village at midnight on Wednesday evening of last week by a masked robber we at once jumped to the conclusion that there was a large sized ethiopian in the woodpile. It afterwards turned out that the hold up was of the practical joke description, but all the same it disarranged the regularity of Mr. Taylor's heart action for a day or so.

During the heavy fog on Tuesday morning a rear end pitch-in occurred at the Grand Trunk station. An east bound freight train was standing inside the station waiting orders, when a following freight train came along and crashed into it, demolishing a number of couplings and wrecking several cars. The semaphore was up at the time but owing to the fog, the engine driver did not notice it until too late to avert the accident. The collision occurred about 1.30 in the morning. The auxiliary from Belleville was soon on the scene and had all traces of the wreck cleared away about noon.

"Breathes there a man with soul so dead,
Who never to himself hath said,"
There's naught on earth that goes ahead
Of either meat, or fish, or bread,
And that so fully "fills the bill"
In various ways as does and will
The egg of the Helpful Hen?

And there's nothing quite "so good to eat,"
That furnishes a rarer treat,
Or a richer feast, and more complete,
When savory, succulent and sweet,
And there's "but little appetite,"
There is no more enrapturing sight
Than a dish of good roast chicken?

Breathes there a woman in all the earth,
Who doesn't know the use and worth
Of the real value of dollars and cents,
Of the saving grace in family expense,
Of the joys and welcomes oft intense,
While patiently waiting in some suspense,
Egg fresh from the Helpful Hen?

Is there a housewife otherwise,
Who fully appreciates her prize,
When she over, and over, and over tries
To make her pudding, and sometimes pies,
And gets into trouble up to her eyes
From failing to use what's about the size
Of the egg of the Helpful Hen?

Breathes there a child in our broad land,
Who hasn't even an open hand,
And mouth a little more open still
With a welcome stomach ready to fill,
And never a thought of "a bitter pill"
When eating with relish, wish and will,
Products of the Helpful Hen?

Breathes there anyone who never sings
In praise of Biddy and what she brings,
Alike to beggars, as well as kings,
Who cover her brood with outstreached

A CRIPPLE FROM RHEUMATISM.

Cured by a Few Doses of South American Rheumatic Cure—Miraculous but Fact.

Mrs. N. Ferris, wife of a well-known manufacturer of Highgate, Ont., says:—"For many years I was sorely afflicted with rheumatic pains in my ankles and at times was almost disabled. I tried everything, as I thought, and doctored for years without much benefit. Though I had lost confidence in medicines I was induced to use South American Rheumatic Cure. To my delight, the first dose gave me more relief than I had had in years, and two bottles have completely cured me." Sold by A. W. Grange & Bro.

He was carried into Mrs. Lott's house by Andrew Russell and Leonard Milburn and in a few hours was sufficiently recovered to permit of his being removed to his home. On recovering consciousness Mr. Jackson had no recollection of the accident. He is now almost completely recovered from the shock The horse was uninjured, but the dashboard of the rig was sadly disfigured.

Mr. Metzler called a meeting of his patrons at Victoria school house Monday night to see what could be done towards paying off. It was found that the patrons would receive their September money all right so that the few days of October's loss will be very slight especially when compared with Mr. Metzler's loss and inconvenience A vote was taken at the meeting to get the exp ession of the people's feeling concerning the rebuilding of the factory and it was carried unanimously in favor of a new cheese factory. The people have had Mr. Metzler to deal with for so many years and have always found him to be a man of honor and sterling qualities so that no one can be found to take his place. At present the neighboring cheese factories have full vats, over 5.000 lbs. going to Odessa factory alone.

DEAR SIRS,—We have used Norway Pine Syrup in our home a great deal. I have a little boy who has had asthma for five or six years (he is only two now), and during the severe attacks he would get great relief from using the syrup. For an ordinary cold it is ahead of any cough medicine I ever took.

ODESSA.

On Wednesday evening of last week a jolly load of Odessa's most talented young people drove over to Hawley, to assist in a concert given in behalf of Mr. Evans. The good people of Hawley had cake and coffee prepared for those that came from a distance, which was very satisfying to the inner man after the long jaunt of twelve miles. The programme consisted of choruses, recitations by some of the Hawley young people, and several solos from the Odessa crowd. Special notice should be given to little Master Brisco, of Hawley, who rendered, "Reaching for the Jam" in a very pleasing manner. The entertainment was brought to a close by the singing of the National Anthem.

The Methodists held their annual Sunday school concert in the town hall on Thursday evening of this week.

Our little town, in the near future, will boast of a new catholic church.

IN CHINA.

Europeans and Americans Have Twenty-Two Ports Open to Residence.

"There are over 10,000 Europeans and Americans resident in China," says The Bulletin de la Societe de Geographie Commercial, Paris. "The English head the list with 4000; the Americans number 1325; Germans, 882; French, 875; Portuguese, 805; Spaniards, 461; Norwegians, 375; Russians, 116; Italians, 108; etc. There are 669 Japanese. Twenty-two ports are open to foreign residence; that is to say, that Europeans are allowed to acquire conditional title to certain lands, on which they live, govern themselves, and have special privileges in judicial matters. The ports are Mengtz, Lung Chow, Pekhoi, King Chow, Lappa, Canton, Kowloon, Swatow, Amoy, Fuchau, Wenchow, Ningpo, Shanghai, Chinklang, Wuhu, Kiukiang, Hankow, Ichang, Chungking, Chefoo, Tientsin and Niuchwang. It is to be noted that Peking does not appear on this list, although the embassies and legations are established there. The Chinese who find themselves under foreign jurisdiction appear more than contented with the situation, because, although taxes are high, they are fixed. Two hundred thousand natives live in the European settlements of Shanghai. Besides the foreign residents of China, a large number live in ports that have been ceded to other nations. For instance, Hongkong comprises in its civil population 4195 Europeans and Americans. With the troops and sailors, this number is raised to 8545. Hongkong is the actual capital of foreign industry in the far east. More than 3000 vessels, with a tonnage of nearly 4,000,000, touch there annually. The same spirit which caused the development of Singapore, Colombo and Hongkong is to be found in the foreign settlements of the open ports of China."

The Diamond Jubilee of Telegraphy.

It is curious that this present year should record the diamond jubilee of telegraphy, and, at the same time, bring into prominent notice the possibilities of wireless telegraphy. On June 10, 1837, Cooke and Wheatstone's first patent for electric telegraphs was signed by William IV. The Pall Mall Gazette states that on July 4 of that year the first telegraph wire was laid. The circuit was between Euston and Camden Town Railway stations, under the permanent way of the London & Northwestern Railway, often named the London and Birmingham Railway Co.). The line consisted of five wires, each wire laid in separate grooves cut out of long blocks of wood. There are many of these blocks in existence. A year or two ago one was dug up, and actually formed part of the circuit through which was flashed to all parts of the empire the message from Buckingham palace on Jubilee day; so that a portion of the first telegraph wire is dug up and serves as an aid to the royal message in the very year in which it is proposed to telegraph without wires.—Paris Edition of The New York Herald.

Hard on the Blood.

Dr. W. T. English of Pittsburgh believes that we eat too much acid food. Nature evidently intended that we should confine our use of acid fruits and vegetables to the summer months, but we now eat them during the whole year. The flavor of tomatoes depends upon the acidum lycopersicum. It is estimated that since 1890 the production of this vegetable has multiplied ten times. In 1885 New York city consumed weekly 25 car loads of lemons. The daily demand now exceeds that amount. Oranges are used in about the same increased quality. Five years ago limes, the most acid of all fruits, were in small demand. Today they are imported fresh and pickled in large numbers. Rhubarb plant, gooseberries, currants, cherries, plums, apples and pears are canned in vast amounts for winter use. Sweet apples are hardly salable in the markets. Acid flavored drinks are in demand at the flavored fountains. Acid conditions favor the development of micro organisms, promote fermentation and cause reduction of red blood corpuscles. A derangement of the heart and other organs often results.

SLOAN'S INDIAN TONIC

The only Permanent Cure for Indigestion.

This is to certify that I, James Ross, Tollgate Keeper, of the Town of Woodstock, Ont., have been a sufferer from Indigestion and a very weak stomach for a number of years and have tried a great many medicines of different kinds, but could only obtain temporary relief for a short time, but after using one bottle of Sloan's Indian Tonic I could perceive a great difference. My indigestion was better and my stomach was much stronger than before, and I found I had gained several pounds in flesh, where I was weak and thin in flesh before. I think I used nine or ten bottles in all, and I am now a healthy man, but still I do not want to be without the medicinee in the house, and I procure one or two bottles every year, and I can truthfully recommend Sloan's Indian Tonic to others suffering from the same complaints.

IT was not exactly right of Archbishop Cleary to associate a wedding with a funeral. If he had forbidden his flock from attending a Protestant christening it would be altogether different and there would have been no kick forthcoming from the Baptists.

ARCHBISHOP CLEARY, of Kingston, has issued a mandate forbidding Catholics from taking part in Protestant weddings and funerals. With due respect to the venerable prelate we hope it will be a long time before either he or any member of his flock are called upon to participate in the obsequies over our remains.

The Deseronto Tribune is out with an able article in which it advocates the establishment of an experimental farm in the Bay district of Eastern Ontario. The project is one which should receive the united support of the farmers and press of the district, and we feel if the matter is laid before the Ontario and Dominion Governments in the proper light it would lead to the establishment of a model farm in one of the places mentioned in the following article from The Tribune, which we quote in full:

"The Ontario Agricultural college and experimental farm at Guelph and the Dominion experimental farm at Ottawa have both been of incalculable value to the farming interests of Ontario. They have been instructive in stimulating to new and improved methods of cultivating the soil and breeding better classes of cattle. They have served as object lessons to thousands of farmers who have from year to year paid them visits of inspection. The most ordinary observer could not fail to glean a great deal of valuable information and receive a stimulous to the adoption of more modern and scientific methods of agriculture. They have especially served to create and foster in the breast of visiting farmers a pride in their calling which had hitherto been lacking. The money expended on both farms has been well spent and is begrudged by but very few people in this province. The new farm at Waubigoon is also proving of great interest as its experiments and methods are especially adapted to the needs of new colonists in Algoma and northern Ontario. The Tribune has long been of the opinion that the Ontario government, or the Ontario government and Dominion government combined, might with great advantage establish another experimental farm in the Bay district of Eastern Ontario. Guelph and Ottawa are almost too far distant for frequent visits from the mass of the farmers in this part of the province. The nature of the country and special conditions arising therefrom call for peculiar methods of agriculture. For many obvious seasons the farmers of this part of Ontario stick most tenaciously to old manners and customs. Hence the greater need of a model farm which could be more generally and frequently visited by the farmers of the counties from Trenton to Brockville The location of such a farm is a matter of secondary interest. A score of suitable places might be mentioned, Napanee, Tweed, Newburgh, Enterprise, Shannonville, Deseronto, Harrowsmith, etc., would be admirable points for such a farm. It need not be on such a large scale as those at Ottawa and Guelph; in fact it should be subsidiary to them. Members of their staff could be utilized in its supervision and management. Its direction would thus not involve a very heavy expenditure. To secure this boon for this part of Ontario only requires united effort on the part of the farming interests of the counties concerned. Our parliamentary representatives would, no doubt, unite in pressing upon the Ontario and Dominion governments the necessity of such a farm. Presidents of farmers' institutes and agricultural societies should especially cooperate and at an early day, by deputation or otherwise, wait upon the governments so that appropriations for the purpose might be placed in the estimates of the two legislatures. It is but seldom that the farmers or these counties ask a favor from government; surely this will not be denied.

LIVES IN DANGER.

The Time for Action and Great Care.

Paine's Celery Compound Should Be Used This Month.

Our changeable Autum weather brings fear to the hearts of thousands of rheumatic sufferers who are unable to go to warmer climes. The present month with its wet, cold weather and chilling north east winds will, without doubt, increase the agonies of those who are afflicted with acute, chronic, inflammatory and sciatic rheumatism. The uric acid in the system, which the kidneys have not removed, is poisoning the blood, causing stiff and swollen joints, twisted legs, arms, fingers, and contracted cords. When it reaches the heart it generally proves fatal.

Rheumatic sufferers, why remain in agony and peril? There is a sure cure and a new life for all if the proper agency is made use of. The true agency, Paine's Celery Compound, has triumphantly met hundreds of cases far more subtile and dangerous than yours; it will surely meet your troubles. It is for you to determine this day whether you shall be free from suffering and take on a new life, or remain in a condition of helplessness and torture that may drag you to the grave at any time.

Bear in mind that Paine's Celery Compound cures all forms of rheumatism, and does the work so well that the disease never returns. Mrs. M. J. Vince, of Barrie, Ont., says:

"I am happy to say that I have taken Paine's Celery Compound with great results. I had sciatica so badly that I could not turn in bed or walk without help; and for a period of three weeks was helplessly laid up and suffered pain that at times was unbearable.

"I tried many medicines, but all in vain. I was afterwards recommended to try Paine's Celery Compound. I used six bottles, and am entirely cured and enjoy good health. I take great pleasure in recommending the valuable medicine that cured me."

A KLONDYKE ROMANCE.

Where Gold is at a Discount Even in Affairs of the Heart.

Lady Claire Klondyke, the golden-haired daughter of the first Duke of Dawson, stood within the grand old oaken hall of her father's palace, overlooking the frozen river and the snow-clad hills. She was clothed heavily in rich and elegant furs, for the winter had been long and cold and the end was not yet.

She shivered as the seneschal announced the arrival of the Count of St. Michael. Full well she knew the intent of the Count's visit, and she steeled herself for the encounter which she knew must follow quick upon their meeting.

Seeing the fair being standing by the wide fireplace of the drawing-room, looking more lovely than he had ever seen her, he approached her side in a whirl of emotion.

"At last!" he ejaculated in suppressed tones.

"Why?" she inquired in a tone of voice which made the Klondyke winter seem like a tropic dream.

"O sweet Claire!" he murmured, "so long have I yearned for this moment. Day unto day uttereth speech and night unto night sheweth knowledge, but all days were dumb to me and all nights
